THE Smithers home was not an attractive one. The house was brown and weathered, like Hide-away House, but there was no friendliness in its barn-like contours; the tiny porch was grudgingly built, as if its owner wanted no time wasted in sitting upon it; there was no saving grace of green vines and blossoms to twine about its stiff posts, for Jacob Smithers knew that vines, in time, would rot shingles. The small door-yard was bare of flowers, save for a few hardy straggling shrubs; his women-folk had small opportunity to linger in their garden, wasting precious time over flower-beds!

Opportunity favored her; Smithers was busily mending a fence by the roadside as she came up. There would be no need to go to the house, pretending a visit to poor Mrs. Smithers and Mary, and Ruth felt thankful for it. She much preferred bearding the lion in open air instead of in his den.

"Good morning, Mr. Smithers. Wonderful weather, isn't it?" she called cheerily as she stopped before the fence.

"Means early snow," explained Smithers, blinking his small eyes rapidly. "Folks in the house, if so be ye come a-visitin'."

"I didn't come visiting today, Mr. Smithers," spoke Ruth bravely. "I want to see you; I want to talk to you about Mary."

"Thank ye for your intrust in my family's affairs, ma'am," said Smithers, dryly, as he hammered away at the fence.

The hot blood flooded Ruth's cheeks at the rebuff; she wished heartily for a brief minute that she were a man, and capable of giving Smithers at least a good shaking. A good shaking was about as much punishment as she could conceive of giving any one.

"I want to say to you, Mr. Smithers," began Ruth, clearly, to drown the sound of the hammer, "that, as a father, I beg you to consider what you are doing about Mary. You know that she and Tom Auld love each other, and that it is wrong—crue!—to make her marry Donaldson, who is not a rich man by any means, I am sure. He is old enough to be a grandfather, besides. And Tom, I am sure, will succeed. Think how good he is to his helpless mother. Tom will make her a good husband, Mr. Smithers and, in time, a good provider. Won't you please think it over before Mary sacrifices herself?"

Jacob Smithers flushed brick color as Ruth impulsively filled. She was sorry she had used the sacrifice as soon as it was uttered, but she could not take it back, and of course it was the truth.

"My darter Mary is not of age," uttered Smithers, briefly, as he gave a last clanging stroke with the hammer, "and she's an obedient girl. I'll thank ye to keep away from meddlin' with her or with me, young lady. If Tom Auld is such a wonderful fine fellow, and such a good provider, let him show a little of it. Let him show that he's money enough to own the roof over his head, and I may change my mind about him and Mary. Unless he can do that, why, I reserve the right to choose a man for my girl who'll do it."

"Good morning, Mr. Smithers," said Ruth, sadly. "I'm sorry you think I come interfering, but I intended it for Mary's good. I see nothing can change you but money, and I haven't any."

"That is," she pondered, as her feet slowly bore her away from the surly farmer and his hammer, "not enough to do any good. I will write to Mr. Gary, however, and see if I have enough, by any chance, to assume that mortgage myself. If Donaldson were paid he would have no hold on Tom, and I might persuade Smithers that I would never foreclose, that Tom might have all the time he wanted to pay me back."

TODAY opportunity—such a mockery of opportunity!—seemed to be with Ruth; for, coming from the pasture driving a cow before her, she came face to face with Mary Smithers.

"Oh, Mary, I'm so glad to meet you!" exclaimed Ruth, impulsively. "Do let your cow graze for a moment and—let me speak to you."

"Certainly, Miss Ruth," agreed Mary quietly, though a soft, pale blush stole over her delicate face. "The cow will be glad to graze, I'm sure."

Now considering that it was September, and that there wasn't a blade of green grass anywhere, this certainly seemed a strange request for Ruth to make, and for Mary, born country girl, to agree to! But the cow placidly chewed her cud in the wan sunshine, and that answered the purpose.

"Mary, dear, why, oh, why, won't you marry poor Tom?" burst forth Ruth, impetuously. "You know how he loves you—everybody says so, and wild horses wouldn't make me marry Donaldson, if I were you. Mary, can't you think it over, and—let Tom know before it is too late?"

Now the pale flush on Mary's cheeks deepened to a richer hue, and she held her head up proudly. "I thank you, Miss Ruth, for thinking of me," she said, quietly but firmly, rather haughtily indeed, "but I certainly don't aim to marry any man who—who!" here poor Mary burst into tears, which rolled helplessly down her helpless little face in big, round drops. "Who won't ask me to!" sobbed Mary, drearily. "Oh, Miss Ruth, you don't know Tom; he's that proud that he'd die before he'd ask me to share his poverty. And I just can't make him, you know. I'm a woman, and we are mighty helpless, in this big world of men, so far as I've seen. I can't marry him against his will."

"You surely can't," agreed Ruth, wide-eyed with astonishment. "I never thought of that, Mary—of poor Tom Auld being so proud. But you know he loves you, don't you?"

"Yes m," agreed Mary, "I guess so—after the way men love folks. If it was me, I'd—I'd just make the girl I loved marry me. I would not sit still and keep my mouth shut tight, and see her enter into misery. Sometimes," said poor Mary, "I think it's a mighty poor sort of love, I do! I've been working hard all my life, and I expect to die working. Then what does he want to wait for? I—I just don't have any patience with him, I don't!" cried Mary, rather wildly.

"But at least you don't have to marry Donaldson," suggested Ruth. "Can't you wait at home? Your father can't Excellent for tennis, canoeing, sailing and all kinds of sports. A popular variation of the universally worn tennis shoe—of sturdy canvas with smooth or corrugated rubber soles

There is a great demand for these Keds this summer—either with a heel or without. Similar models have an ankle strap. Of fine white canvas with either smooth or corrugated rubber sole

Twenty million people will change to summer shoes —when they change to summer clothes

WHY should we wear shoes of the same material in summer as in winter?

Nowadays canvas rubber-soled shoes that have made themselves so popular for sport are worn all day long right through the summer.

Millions of women are now changing to Keds for summer wear just as they change to summer dresses. They have learned that they can look fresher, feel more comfortable, more relaxed, and enjoy summer sports much better than before.

There are trim everyday Keds —pumps, oxfords and high shoes. There are sturdy Keds for camping, tramping, sports and games of every kind.

For children there are pumps, oxfords, sandals, high shoes, for play, dress and school. Other Keds for men and boys.

There is a difference between Keds and the ordinary canvas shoes with rubber soles—a difference you will notice right away. The wide variety of models, the good lines, the firm, careful construction that makes them hold their shape so well and wear so long, the fineness of the canvas, the whiteness of the rubber.

The United States Rubber Company originated Keds and is the only company making them. Be sure to look for the name Keds on the shoe—the guarantee of quality and service.

make you marry a man—the laws forbid that."

"He would kill Mother—he'd take it out on her," said Mary, shaking her head sadly. "None of us dare disobey father, for he knows we know what he'll do to her. Her life's hard enough, as it is. No, ma'am, I'll go through with it. Maybe I'll die soon and get it over with."

THERE was no need for further entreaty. Mary touched the cow with the long switch she was carrying, and the patient animal left her wan sunshine and trudged ahead of the girl, on their way to the Smithers barn.

"It seems to me very much as if I were meddling with fate," mused Ruth, as she, too, took her way homeward, "and fate, I'm told, can't be meddled with!"

Her own little home seemed very bright and friendly when she entered its door. Ellen Hawtree had the house too warm, of course, but it showed the furnace worked beautifully, and open doors and windows soon dispelled the warmth. "If poor Miss Emily only had some of the coal Ellen has wasted," mourned Ruth.

Miss Emily, well, might be left alone, but Miss Emily, helpless, with her right hand in red flannel and liniment, and jobless, must be helped, willy nilly.

"If she would only agree to spend the winter with me, now," pondered Ruth, "it would be lovely. Everything would turn out all right by spring, I know. But in that shanty, without sufficient fuel or food, she will be utterly helpless. Well, thinking about it will do no good, just now. I'll go see if that chicken is tender enough to fill the pie-crust."

Ellen Hawtree had scrupulously tended the chicken, which was, she stated triumphantly, "tender as tender." But how old Miss Auld eats all she do is a puzzle to me," stated Ellen, frankly, as she watched her employer mix dough with a skilful hand, and fill the pie dish. "You takes her enough to keep her goin' for a week, some days."

"There's Tom, you know," suggested Ruth, her face flushing a little at Ellen's artless query. "Men eat a good deal. And—and they give some of it to their lodger, I know. I am glad to be able to do it for them, Ellen, for we who have plenty ourselves are apt to forget our neighbors who haven't it. You remember the Bible says it is better to give than to receive."

"Oh, now, if you could jest see into Mis' Smitherses pantry!" quoth Ellen, hugging her round red arms, as she always did under excitement, "that bare it is—no jelly nor jam nor canned stuff for winter—all sold soon's it's made. Folks eats jest bread, skim milk and meat, mighty little meat."

Ruth heaped the chicken into the crust, sprinkled it with flour, butter and pepper; she sliced hard-boiled eggs and put them in generous layers, pouring over all a rich cream gravy before she placed the top crust on the dish.

"I've seen the day I could 'a' eat it all," beamed Ellen, enthusiastically, "before you got me filled up proper."

WHEN the pie was ready Ruth placed the dish on a tray, added a loaf and a pat of sweet butter with a pitcher of milk, and took her way sadly toward Nancy Auld's abode.

The sound of Nancy Auld's voice singing a hymn reached her as she entered. Nancy, Ruth had learned, always sang hymns when she was unusually despondent; she said the words cheered her up.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face."

The sweet old voice faltered a bit, Ruth could sense that it was full of tears.

"Why, Nancy, Nancy dear," she exclaimed, brightly, "singing hymns today? I hope it's just because you love the words, not because you are feeling badly."

Nancy, knitting busily, wiped her eyes on the yarn as she answered, choking back a sob: "No use in fetching him trays now, honey—the writer man, poor Mr. Blair, has gone back to the city. Left this morning on the early train."

Many Readers Discuss the Family Altar and Its Influence

RESPONDING to the invitation extended by Dr. Sheldon, many readers have written to the Christian Herald strongly urging the setting up of the Family Altar in the Christian homes of America, and telling of the spiritual atmosphere it has created in their own homes. We would like to print all of these letters; but as space limitations make this impracticable, we give below a few which fairly represent the whole. We commend these to the attention of all who recognize the vital question at issue, and especially the importance of the spiritual training of the young and impressionable.

R. A. Clark, Springfield, Mass., writes: "Family prayer in my father's family has always been a pleasant memory to me. When we were married, nearly twenty-nine years ago, we at once started the same custom and have continued it to the present. Of course, occasionally circumstances have prevented the full program. Sometimes we have had only a prayer, but usually reading and prayers, followed by the Lord's prayer. The presence of guests has often raised a question, but usually we have followed our program and usually the guest has joined heartily. At times we have read in turn, each having a Bible, then again only one has read. Sometimes we have read portions—stories or books—of the Bible in course, or have taken readings from various sources. At different times, especially while the children (two) were little, we have sung or recited hymns; learned and recited psalms; twice read Pilgrims' Progress; once read Bunyon's Holy War; read from Story of the Bible; read from different versions, and learned the Bible Books in order. But mostly we have had just the reading and prayer. I believe every family would be helped by regular family prayers—as regular as possible. If nothing more, which is hardly conceivable, this will give, in course of time, a knowledge of the Bible as literature and this alone is worth while. It is not always easy to have the Family Altar, but I believe it pays."

Thomas P. Thompson, Franklin, N. H., writes: "We have a Family Altar; have had one fifty-seven years, sick or well, cold or hot, busy or not. We consider it very important. The time is immediately after the morning meal. We read the Sunday-school home reading; all kneel; the head of the house leads in prayer, then each member of the family offers prayer vocally, not a prayer learned from a prayer book. This takes eight or ten minutes. Sometimes a hymn is sung. An atmosphere is created which goes with us through the day. Children are not compelled to pray, but seeing father and mother praying, they are inclined to join. We believe the Family Altar is practicable in every Christian home."

Mrs. H. P. Wezeman, Oak Park, Ill., writes: "Yes, we have a Family Altar. Ours is a Holland custom, but a very excellent one. It is that of praying before each meal, reading a chapter from the Bible and returning thanks. Since we have six children, the oldest only eight years old, it requires perseverance to adhere to this custom, time-honored among Christians of Holland descent. No matter how distinguished or unbelieving our guest may be, we pray to our Heavenly Father and read His Word. Father intercedes for the family at the throne of grace. Although Evelyn and Peter are only eight and seven years of age they are able to read portions of Scripture in both the Holland and English language. Since the children are young and retire early, they are not present when grown-up members gather for prayer before retiring. This prayer, however, is very essential to the spiritual life and dear to the father's heart and mine, for it is then that we can lay our burdens down, raise our petitions heavenward, and feel the touch of the Divine, and the peace of God descend into our souls. 'Is it possible and necessary in every home?' you ask. I answer: Most emphatically, yes."

Charles M. Neel, Cornelia, Ga., writes: "For several years I have read the Christian Herald with spiritual pleasure. Replying to your questions as to the Family Altar, I wish to state: We have family Bible reading and prayer after the evening meal. Wishing to make it a joint service, the members of the family choose a topic or subject; and during the reading, any member may ask a question or make a comment. When a biography has been completed, we sum up the lessons to be learned from the character. My grandson, Frank, often stops my reading to ask information. A Christian atmosphere can not be developed in a home otherwise. For six months after the world war began, my faith in Christianity was staggered. After The Hague Court was established, I was sure that never again would there be war among enlightened Christian nations. Yet I saw not only war, but the most savage, cruel war of history. I would abolish the sword and set up the Cross."

Blanche E. Gardner, West N. Brighton, N. Y., writes: "Referring to your editorial in the Christian Herald regarding the Family Altar, I would say we have one, and have found it a great help, especially in teaching the children about the Bible. My husband passed away a year ago, so the two oldest girls aged nine and twelve, read the Bible reference in a book called 'A Guide to Family Devotions,' by Rev. Alexander Fletcher, and I read the prayer. I think it possible for every family to have a Family Altar, and that any family which once took it up would soon decide that they could not get along without it. I have been surprised at the questions my three girls ask me about Bible facts, during our morning devotions. It takes only about fifteen minutes, which can easily be spared. I am very glad to see the Christian Herald taking up this question, and you have my sincere prayers that more families in this land, and all lands, may enjoy a few minutes of family communion with the great Giver of all gifts."

Rev. W. Price, Pastor, Baptist Church, Oneonta, Ala., writes: "It will be quite unnecessary, I am sure, for me to mention with what esteem you are held in the South, as well as all over the country, for your very practical Christian activities. Answering your question as regards the Family Altar, I would answer the first question, 'Do you have a Family Altar?' Yes. We do not think we could maintain correct relations with God and His Cause, nor with our people, nor with our children, without it. It sweetens our lives, tempers our conduct with others, and gives our children a love, reverence and knowledge of the old Book which will be their guide and stay throughout their lives. 'How do you conduct it?' you ask. We read consecutively—just now in the New Testament. There is always some central truth in each chapter. We locate this and explain it in story form, always visualizing the scene before us. No one can fully appreciate or understand the Scriptures unless he places himself in the speaker's chair and tries to see the people, the conditions, the scene as he saw it. 'Is it possible and necessary in every home?' Yes, the home needs only to adjust itself to the requirements of the occasion. This can be done if the desire for it is sufficient. If the hands of nearly 1000 people went up in answer to the question, 'Were you brought up in a home where the Family Altar was the custom?' and less than fifty hands would go up representing family altars today, I am just wondering two things: First, what caused the decline? And second, what will be the spiritual condition of the next generation?"

Rollin A. Williams, Daytona, Fla., writes that in his household Family Altar service, the head of the house reads the Bible, then leads in prayer and sometimes other members follow. Then all unite in the Lord's Prayer. The little ones are taught to repeat a prayer after their father, thus: "God bless papa and mamma and make me good." "We have a set time," he adds, "for order is God's just law."

W. H. Duncan, Conway, Ark., writes: "I have a Family Altar in my home. Ordinarily a chapter or a part of a chapter in the Bible is read, or we say verses (from the Bible) or a member of the family recites a Psalm, when we assemble at the table for supper or on Sundays at dinner. Then we pray the Lord's Prayer together. I believe it possible to have family prayers in every home, and I am strongly of the opinion that Family Altar is of imperative necessity."

This investor is certain of "getting the principal back" because every Miller Bond has behind it a first mortgage on non-speculative income-producing realty. "Don't wait for danger signals"

NATURE sends out danger signals when the intestines become clogged. These warnings are often coated tongue, drowsiness, headache and a disinclination to eat. They warn that the blood has absorbed poisons from the intestines and that they are flooding through the body, reaching every tiny cell.

It is a serious condition

"A person so affected, is not only subject to troubles within the body but is weakened against illness from without. He becomes an easy prey to such ailments as colds, grippe or influenza. A constipated child is more exposed to measles, whooping cough, scarlet fever and so on. And in the case of a nursing mother, blood that is loaded with such poisons affects those cells which provide milk for the baby, thus injuring the infant.

"Just a little care will keep your family in good health. See that their intestines are kept clean. The most efficient way to do this is to give them Nujol, regularly."

Why Nujol relieves

Without irritating or forcing the system, Nujol simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze the food waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system, regularly and thoroughly.

Nujol relieves constipation without any unpleasant or weakening effects. It does not upset the stomach, cause nausea or griping, nor interfere with the day's work or play. Nujol is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take. Try it.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

AMONG the letters received during the past week are the following:
J. A. B., Breckenridge, Texas, asks prayers that some way may be provided for him so that he may take up his studies for the ministry.

A Mother in Fort Wayne, Ind., writes: "I have been a sufferer from tuberculosis for four years. Am not incurable, and have been taking the cure for sixteen months, but I lose courage and have a fear at times I never will get well. I ask the League to pray that I may have more love to overcome fear and courage to fight my battle; and that my health may be restored, for I have a husband and two little girls waiting for me at home. Not my will, but God's will be done."

A Reader in Oklahoma asks prayers for two boys, fifteen and sixteen years of age respectively, who are in jail for stealing, that they may be converted and lead new lives.

A Wife, Ringwood, Okla., asks prayers in behalf of a husband, that he may fully surrender to Christ.

L. E. B. writes: "Please join with me in prayer to our Heavenly Father, through Jesus our Saviour, that I may be saved from a threatened loss which involves the Lord's tenth and more for His cause."

Mrs. L. M. N., Sanbornton, writes: "As a member of the League, and knowing that God does hear and answer prayer, I ask that you will pray Him to send His divine Spirit in power to the people of Sanbornton, N. H. Three of the churches have no pastors and the church doors are closed. The fourth church is in a very low condition spiritually, and the attendance very small."

Mrs. L. E. B., Albany, Ala., acknowledges answered prayer and adds: "Please remember the church here, that the Lord will send more leaders and that His blessing may rest upon those we already have."

Believer, Portland, Me., writes: "Pray for the church at Falmouth Foreside, that we may have a revival of religion and that many may be saved and the church built up."

D. M. R. gives thanks for prayer being answered for a great spiritual revival in Calgary, Canada, and requests persistent prayer for a continued effusion of the Holy Spirit upon all the churches of the city.

E. E. A. asks prayers for the conversion of a protégé who is entering into manhood, and is just now "having his fling."

A. S., Philadelphia, asks prayers for a Home for Aged People, where unbelief is very strong, and writes: "Please pray God to send an overwhelming wave of Christian revival into this Home."

S., Charlottesville, Va., writes: "I am presenting this serious question to you for which I ask your devout prayers. Our University of Virginia Hospital is about to be moved to Richmond, and this is a calamity to all of the sick and sorrowing of northern Virginia and West Virginia. The ministers and all the good people of the churches are praying that something may happen to keep this place of mercy for the sick."

Among the general requests for prayer are the following: healing, 88; spiritual advancement, 5; financial aid, 7; faith, 9; conversion of relatives and friends, 55; blessing, 11; courage, 3; success, 3; wisdom, 7; guidance, 8; relief, 1; and that dear ones may be cured of bad habits, 8.

Mrs. T. Y. writes: "Sometime ago I wrote asking prayer that I might be relieved of cancer. I wish to say it has been removed, and I can never be thankful enough to my Heavenly Father for his goodness to me."

We have also received acknowledgments of answered prayers from Mrs. G. W., Mrs. M. B. L., Mrs. S. C. W., Mrs. L. E. B., Mrs. S. B. D., Mrs. B. F. W., J. C., Mrs. G. A. B., Mrs. K. A. H., E. H. W., Mrs. W. V. S., and Praying Friend, Richmond.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

GRAHAM PATTERSON, PUBLISHER

How goes it with the enforcement of prohibition? What effect is the banning of intoxicants exercising on the lives and welfare of the American people? Dr. McLennan, director of the Welcome Hall Social Settlement in Buffalo, presents answers to those questions as the result of careful study supplementing the inquiry he made a year ago for the Federal Council of the Churches. The Christian Herald published Dr. McLennan's account of that inquiry and his present analysis of the prohibition developments of the year provides a document of unusual interest.

Checking Up Prohibition

By WILLIAM E. McLENNAN

Decoration by William C. McNulty

The majority had families of small children, only one of the men having grown sons and daughters, and forty having at least one child each under five. The income of all the families was inadequate because of the amount the fathers were spending for drink, and when they were laid off, which frequently happened, the families were destitute. The misery of the homes was characteristic of the drunkard's home everywhere.

The results of prohibition on these forty-six homes are briefly summarized as follows:

(1) Just before July 1, 1919, five of the forty-six intemperates were nervously in such condition from excessive drinking that they were unfit for work, and had to receive medical treatment. After July 1, they immediately stopped drinking, none of them making any effort at that time or since to secure intoxicating liquor. Of the other forty-one, none has shown any bad results physically of sudden cessation from drinking. In most cases, on the contrary, there has been a steady and remarkable improvement in their physical condition, an improvement to which both their appearance and their families bear testimony.

(2) Not one of the forty-six persons addicted to the habit of drink has taken to the use of any drug.

(3) Although there has been an increase in the number of cases of desertion in the society at large during a year of prohibition, of the forty-six but one deserted this year.

(4) There is little difference as yet in the way the homes are furnished.

(5) It was believed that a change would be observed in the care of children. This hope has been realized. The children in these forty-six families are distinctly better dressed and better nourished than previously.

(6) The men are not holding their jobs more continuously—owing largely to the nature of the work in which most of the men concerned are employed—labor on the streets, longshore work, etc. However, they have not lost time between jobs as heretofore.

THE reports I have from settlement residents, who of all social workers come into closest contact with the foreigner and the poor of our cities, are substantially in accord with the statement of Dr. John L. Elliott, headworker of Hudson Guild, New York, that "on the whole the effect of prohibition has been exceedingly good; indeed, it has brought a real blessing." That is the judgment also of visiting nurses, charity workers and the like, though there are some of these who regard prohibition as a mixed blessing up to the present time, due to the lax enforcement of the law and the vending of poisonous compounds as substitutes for liquor.

Regarding the subjects of emigration and labor's attitude to prohibition, there is nothing of importance to add to what was stated in last year's report, except to say that there is now no one bold enough to claim that the people who left the country since the close of the war did so on account of prohibition. The statement that labor as a whole is unfriendly to prohibition is no longer seriously considered.

Coming to the general subject of crime and criminal returns, while exact and up-to-date figures are wanting in some instances, there are enough data of a reliable sort to demonstrate that there has been not only a general increase of crime but also that, beginning with the closing months of last year and the opening months of the present year, the percentage of arrests for intoxication and disorderly conduct—the latter usually the outgrowth of intoxication—has increased in all the cities under investigation, and also, judged by apparently reliable reports throughout the entire country; though in no instance, so far as information is at hand, does this increase bring the figures up to those that prevailed before prohibition came into effect.

In making the above statement and in quoting the statistics below, I am not unmindful of the uncertainty of all so-called criminal statistics. A rise in the number of arrests for a specified period may mean, not that criminality has increased but that criminals are being apprehended. Certain terms which the police use, such as "disorderly conduct," are capable of much misunderstanding. If a man is arrested committing some crime while intoxicated it is often "up to" the police officer making the arrest to decide whether the man will be booked for the crime or for drunkenness. Such considerations should be kept in mind in passing upon the figures which follow.

IN NEW YORK CITY the commitments for intoxication to the department of correction to serve any sentence were: In 1918, 1,449; in 1919, 920, and in 1920, 541. From January to March 26 of the present year, the number of commitments was 300, more than

IN THE investigation made in April, 1920, of the effects of prohibition for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the committee on platform of the Republican Party, I visited New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Harrisburg, Columbus; Chicago and Detroit, reporting my findings under eleven separate heads, as follows: Police returns; returns from houses of correction, jails, etc.; returns from hospitals; reports from municipal and private lodging-houses, rescue missions, etc.; reports of community organizations; effects of prohibition on children; effects of prohibition on industrial accidents; prohibition and labor; prohibition and recent emigration; relation of prohibition to the use of harmful drugs; prohibition and public opinion.

In that report I stated that the material I had secured did not appear to me to warrant definite conclusions respecting the effects of prohibition on the general prosperity, on industrial accidents or on community life. Later facts, so far as I have been able to secure them—not having revisited these cities—do not materially help to make the subjects of the relation of prohibition to the general prosperity and to industrial accidents much if any clearer or more definite.

A year ago, about all I could say of the effects of prohibition on community life was by way of approval of the statement of a superintendent of a charity organization that "we know what way the wind is blowing." We can say something more than that today.

IN AN interesting and suggestive study made by the Boston Family Welfare Society (formerly the Associated Charities) of forty-six families in which, prior to July 1, 1919, "intemperance was the leading problem," the following facts are shown: The husbands averaged thirty-five years of age; only seven were under thirty, and only six were over forty-five.

half the total number committed during the whole of last year. It may be added in this connection that the total number of arrests in New York City for intoxication for the year 1918 was 7,284; for 1919, 5,657; for 1920, 5,813.

Harrisburg records show that for the first three months of 1919, the total arrests in that city were 431; for intoxication, 227. For the same period in 1920, the total arrests were but 96; for intoxication, 28. For the first three months of the present year, the total arrests were 300. The arrests for intoxication for January and February only of the present year were 64—a marked increase in both total arrests and arrests for intoxication over the same period in 1920, but less than for the same period for 1919.

The returns for Columbus for the first three months of 1919 show that the total arrests aggregated 2,794; for intoxication, 637. For the same period for 1920, the total arrests were but 1,162; and, for intoxication, only 60. For the first two months of this year—the figures for March have not yet been compiled—the arrests for all offenses were 1,296, and for intoxication, 124.

The increase of arrests for intoxication in Buffalo in the past three months as compared with a similar period last year is large—160 per cent. The figures for these two periods are as follows: for last year, 698; for this year, 1,829. The total arrests in Buffalo for January and February, 1919, were 5,287; for the same period last year, 1827. For those two months this year, the total arrests were 4,038.

I have not been able to secure returns from the other cities I visited a year ago, but I have no doubt, from indirect information given me, that they show substantially the same results as those I have cited.

The only returns from alcoholic wards of hospitals that I have in my possession are the figures from Kings County Hospital and Bellevue Hospital, New York City—these two institutions being the only hospitals in that city receiving alcoholic patients. The number of these patients at the former during the first three months of 1919 was 278; for the same period in 1920 the number was 63; for the past three months the total aggregated 190. At Bellevue, the number of alcoholics for the first three months of 1919 was 831; for the same period in 1920, the number was 315; for this year the number reached 435.

TO THE question, "What are the causes of this marked increase of arrests for intoxication?" While answers are likely to reflect the individual point of view, there is obviously one cause on which all shades of opinion must agree—more liquor (or substitutes for liquor) has been obtained and consumed during the past few months. That means, of course, that the prohibitory law has been widely and generally violated, and in certain sections practically set at naught, so that even the friends of prohibition in certain places have been forced to admit that more intoxicants of one kind or another have been dispensed than before prohibition went into effect.

How the law has been evaded and in places set at defiance has many explanations. One of these has to do with the insignificant penalty inflicted upon the lawless by the courts—a circumstance that naturally encourages the lawbreaker to feel that the courts are more or less in sympathy with him. The chief of police of a city in New York, not far from the Pennsylvania border, in a confidential report to the State Commission of Prisons for 1920, says: "The local officers have made several arrests for violation of the Eighteenth Amendment, but in no case has there been a penalty inflicted which would keep the offenders from a future violation. In two cases where the local officers made arrests and confiscated liquors, the city had to incur the expense of taking them before a United States commissioner and then before a Federal judge in New York City where they were fined $20.00 each, and I have reason to believe are doing business still."

Another thing that has worked in the interest of the violator of the law, is the lack of co-operation among officials and courts, well shown by the situation that has hitherto prevailed in the state of New York, now happily changed by the adoption by the last legislature of the Mullan-Gage enforcement bills which brings the state into line with the Federal government. These laws will undoubtedly insure much more co-operation among Federal, state and local authorities.

In many of its selections of enforcement agents, the government has been, to say the least, unfortunate. The evidence of this is shown on all sides. As late as the middle of April of this year, Judge Hazen of the Federal court in Buffalo sentenced five enforcement agents to terms in the Atlanta penitentiary, together with a fine of $500 each, for accepting bribes. Others are yet to be tried for the same crime, while reports are widespread implicating many others of not only winking at violations of the law but conspiring against its enforcement. Such crimes are worse; they do more harm than the open sale of intoxicants, for they strike at the very heart of the nation. One can but wonder why the appointment of these agents was not made a part of the civil service procedure in similar cases. Civil service may not be perfect, but it is, at worst, far better than the political influence which often determines appointments.

IT IS evident that in many sections of the country, especially in cities, both the spirit and letter of the law have been violated through the misuse of certain privileges accorded druggists and physicians, and by the continuance of saloons as soft-drink shops. Major A. V. Dalrymple, supervising Federal prohibition agent, speaking before the City Club of Chicago on September 20 last, said, "In Chicago there are actually more dispensers of alcoholic liquors now than formerly, when such action was legal; for, in addition to the saloon-keepers, there are many druggists and doctors in the liquor business. The records disclosed that one druggist sold 800 gallons of whiskey in nine days. One physician alone issued 7,534 prescriptions for alcohol in about one month. Altogether over one and one-half million prescriptions have been issued by local (Chicago) physicians in about one year." It must be admitted, too, that many so-called "good citizens" have either violated the law themselves, or connived at its violation by others, through the mistaken view that the law itself is something of a joke. Such persons need to understand that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is a pretty serious matter, to be taken seriously.

It is evident that within the past six months there has been a more or less organized campaign on the part of the enemies of prohibition to make the law ridiculous, or, at any rate, to convince Americans that their liberties are somehow in danger from fanatics. One of the signs of this campaign is the report, which continues to be carried by the press as genuine news, that the so-called blue laws are about to be resurrected and, if possible enforced by certain puritanic individuals and organizations, notwithstanding the repeated denials of the individuals and organizations concerned that nothing of the sort has been contemplated. This propaganda is so persistent that its purpose can hardly be questioned.

While positive proof is wanting there is something more than suspicion that the increase in drunkenness shown in the crime records of the past six months, evidencing a much greater consumption of liquor than formerly, is due in large degree to an organization or association of criminals and near-criminals, influenced by the promise of large money profit, whose purpose it is to win at all hazards, not excepting murder. One sign of this is the astounding record of the Heitler (familiarily known as "Mike de Pike"), Perlman and Greenburg gang of Chicago, one of whose exploits was the smuggling of a car-load of whiskey from Kentucky to Chicago and its distribution through ex-saloonkeepers, policemen and others.

THAT the facts set forth above represent a danger for prohibition cannot be denied, though too much can be made of them. Indeed, the situation can be regarded as, in a way, hopeful, in that it constitutes a challenge to the people of the country whose chief danger is apathy toward law or, at any rate, an attitude which appears to assume that a law once adopted will somehow enforce itself. Prohibition will never enforce itself—that goes without saying—and the efforts, especially illegal and criminal efforts, to overthrow it will serve only to awaken public sentiment and unite it against those who would nullify the law.

One of the outstanding impressions which forced itself upon me during my investigation a year ago was the surprising number of friends prohibition had won to itself since its adoption—had won, I mean, from the other camp. The fact that the majority for prohibition in Congress is larger today than when the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted is one of the significant straws showing which way the wind is blowing. And these men in Congress who favor prohibition may safely be regarded as representing greater majorities for the law at home. There never was a more foolish statement made than that prohibition was adopted by a minority of the people.

If politicians, public officials and others who flatter themselves that they are good judges of public opinion imagine that prohibition has few friends and that these may safely be disregarded, they would be serving their own interest well to undeceive themselves as quickly as possible. For prohibition appears to have come to stay and it is going to be enforced sooner or later—at any rate as well as the run of laws.

A Christian King in Africa

By W. DOUGLAS MACKENZIE

IN ALL South Africa only one man has been allowed by the British Government to retain a position somewhat analogous to that of the ruler of an independent State in India. The British Resident at his capital town of Serowe does not weaken but rather strengthen and emphasize the fact that Khama alone is the real ruler of his native land. This man has for more than fifty years shown himself of royal mould and spirit, and stands out today in South Africa as the greatest leader of his race. This is due to his high Christian character, his great ability, and his singular wisdom.

He has been one of my heroes since far-off boyhood days, when my father, John Mackenzie, was resident missionary at Shoshung, for long the capital town of the Bamangwato, the tribe which Khama's father built up from weakness to great strength, and over which he has ruled so long. I remember how often Khama used to ride up from the native town to the mission house to hold long consultations with my father, both of them about thirty years of age. As he left he would pick me up (or my younger brother), put me on his saddle, and walk beside the horse a short way towards the town. Since those days he has never lost interest in our families, and I still at intervals hear that he has been inquiring about me as "Willie," and about my mother, who is known in that region, native-fashion, as "Ma-Willie."

For with all his great ability and firmness of will, Khama combines a deep tenderness of heart and sound fidelity to those whom he has loved.

Khama and his younger brother, Khamane, were led into the Christian life while still young men by a Hanoverian missionary; but the real formation of Khama's character and inspiration of his policy came from John Mackenzie and J. D. Hepburn, two missionaries of the London Missionary Society who lived successively, and each for many years, in close fellowship with him through all the great crises of his own and his tribe's history. He had much to contend with in his own family. His father, the able and unscrupulous Sekhome, hated Christianity and strove in every way to get his sons broken away from "the Word." When young Khama refused to take, according to the custom of all chiefs, a second wife, and Khamane also resisted, the father drove them and their numerous admirers out of the town, and made war against them. When this failed, and the young men came back to greater popularity than ever, he brought in another relative, Macheng, as wicked as himself, to supplant his own sons. Trying years of plotting against their influence and their lives ensued. Throughout Khama behaved with consummate tact, modesty and goodness.

AT LAST, in 1872, Khama became actual chief of the Bamangwato. He once said, "When I was a lad I used to think how I would govern my tribe and what kind of a kingdom it should be." No royal dreamer ever resolved more wisely than he. On the one hand he determined to have no hand in heathen practices attaching to this chieftainship. On the other hand he would forbid no one to continue these practices who still believed in them. Freedom of thought and action were to characterize his kingdom. This policy has been maintained consistently to this day.

On one matter Khama, however, decided to allow no freedom. He began early to fight the traffic in drink, whether it was imported by white traders or made from millet by his own people. He confronted, with great courage and high moral indignation, the white men who at first dared to oppose his authority. When one of them asked for pity in the name of old friendship, Khama retorted: "Don't talk to me about friendship. You are my worst enemy. You ask for pity, and you show me no pity. You despise my laws, and defy me in the presence of all my people. My people and I are not worthy of pity because God has made our faces black and yours white. No, I have no pity." And he expelled from his country every trader who imported drink.

In 1885 Khama proposed to the British Government a plan by which he should receive through a Resident the protection of that Government, but himself be left to rule his country of seventy thousand square miles, one of the most significant documents in the history of the contact between white and black in South Africa.

I could write long on this man's remarkable acts; his singular self-abnegation, combined with powerful assertion of the right; his repeated deeds of mercy to those who sought his life; his noble bearing in all dealings with the other governments, Boer and British alike; his fatherly care for the slaves, whom at last he set free; his loyalty to the Christian faith; his happy though often bereaved home circle, his statesmanship in the direction of the fortunes of his tribe, internally, as well as in external relations. Withal I must note his martial courage and force when he had to fight against the evil and bloodthirsty Matabele (Zulu) tribe, who attacked him repeatedly.

All these qualities were supremely illustrated when, in 1895, it was proposed to hand over his splendid territory to the British South Africa Chartered Company. His plan of fighting Cecil Rhodes on this plan was to go with several other chiefs straight to London. Their arrival in Great Britain created widespread interest. Khama became a kind of lion in society, and at great meetings which he addressed through an interpreter he aroused sympathy and admiration. Many spoke in utter amazement of the high-souled character which shone out in Khama's bearing through all these trying and testing scenes. He won the day, and since that time he has continued his reign amid peace and prosperity, loved by his subjects, trusted by the British Government and admired by all who know his story for his kingly spirit and his Christian heart.

The Comfort-Bringer

Part Four
CHAPTER VIII

A Heart-Warming Five-Part Story

By ANNE MCQUEEN

RUTH placed the tray on Nancy's little stand; carefully she tucked the napkin about the pie-dish, absorbed apparently, in keeping it warm.

Nancy talked on, placidly, now, brightening at sight of her "comfort-bringer." "He insisted on payin' Sary Bryson, honey—said she had kept him alive, so's his energy could be give to his book, which now he knows warn't worth it—not at all! I never see him so low-spirited, for he used to think a heap of that book, when it was writin'." He gave me this, honey."

Nancy took from her knitting-bag an envelope containing a fat roll of bills—all the writer man could spare, he said, but not half enough to pay Sary Bryson for her good cooking.

"And more'n he could spare, if you believe me, honey," declared Nancy, shaking her head mournfully, "for it's my opinion he had mighty little but his hope; and that seemed to leave him, now that he's got to wait on that publisher man to let him know about the book."

Ruth took the envelope which Nancy held out with a deprecating hand. "I wanted to tell him, the worst way, that it warn't Sary, but just an angel of goodness, that wouldn't take his money for nothin'," Nancy said, but Ruth, taking the envelope very quietly, did not seem to hear her. She was absently tucking the napkin about the side of her dish.

Then, after a moment, Ruth, the smiling, happy-hearted Ruth, sank on her knees by Nancy's side, buried her face in Nancy's lap, and wept as if her heart were breaking!

"There, there, honey lamb, cry all you want to!" soothed Nancy, stroking the smooth head; "you that's always comfortin' somebody or other needs a bit now and then, same's the rest of us. Cry all you want to!"

Wise woman, Nancy Auld, who comforted without inquiry into the cause needing comfort! Ruth, under the touch of Nancy's soft, old hand, grew quiet; she felt very much like a child who is soothed by its mother. At last she lifted her head, dried her eyes and rose to her feet with a little laugh.

"I am acting like a baby, Nancy," she apologized, "but I am so sorry for him—so very, very, sorry! And—and I'll keep this money, for the present, till I can think of some way—some lovely way, to spend it, so that it will do somebody good."

"That's what I knew," nodded Nancy, happy to see the soft eyes dry again. "And that book, honey, it's a good book, I lay that! He thinks it is no account jest because it's his. There's folks like that, about their own work; it don't never seem worth anything till somebody else finds it out."

"Yes, yes," said Ruth. "I know. And now you and Tom must eat the chicken-pie for your supper; it is a perfectly fine pie, if I do say it myself."

Nancy knew it was; and Tom, maybe, would relish it. Poor Tom hadn't been like himself lately; Nancy feared it was a cold he was taking; silent and dull-like. He's been working right hard lately for Donaldson, getting in the crops.

Donaldson again! Was he to create discord and unhappiness in so many lives, and remain untouched by their misery? Was there no way of preventing it—without money?

But she said nothing of this to Nancy Auld, whom she left in a much brighter mood, sitting in her wheel-chair with the big cat purring contentedly at her feet, his sleepy eyes, between narrow slits, fixed longingly on the savory smelling pie, which would furnish him juicy bones, later on; he was certain in his cat mind of that!

THERE was a letter for Ruth, a few days later, written by David Blair from the city. In it he begged pardon for leaving her without a farewell, but mere words could not tell her how much the few weeks of her company had meant to him.

"I could not trust myself to tell you," went on the letter, hurried now and swiftly written, as if the writer's thoughts had burst the cold control of the pen, "and now it is impossible to write it—I will not try!"

"I had thought, if the book were accepted, to see you again; but the book will not be accepted! I am sure of that; sure now, that it is gone, and I can review its many faults, that it is worthless!—a failure, just as I am a failure.

"You will forget me, because I am not worth being remembered"—("Oh, how could he say that!") "but I will always bear in my mind the picture of a girl who is, indeed and in truth, a Comfort-Bringer."

Such a poor little letter! If Ruth, with the wisdom of woman, had not been able to read between its lines. Being a woman, however, she saw possibilities in it that sent the blood to her cheeks and a soft light to her eyes. And she laid the letter away where she could look at it very often; that and the envelope containing Sary Bryson's wages.

"David Blair, I know what you wanted to say in that letter—what you wanted to say to me, if you had not been afraid to trust yourself!" she whispered softly to herself "and—and I think I know, oh, writer man, I am sure I know—what I would have answered! And you are not a failure—and I won't forget you! So there!"

She had not written to her guardian, but now something happened that showed her the need to write was urgent: Mrs. Abner Green flurried and panting, toiled up the road one day soon after these happenings, bonnet askew and purpose in her eye.

Ruth, digging up some bulbs, met her at the gate, trowel in hand. "Just go right in, dear Mrs. Green," she said, cordially, "and I'll join you in a moment. Ellen has a good fire in the sitting-room, I know."

But Mrs. Green stood by the fence and panted: "I got to tell you right now, Ruth; I can't wait even a minute. That Scotchman with a flint stone in his chest 'stead o' muscle, is goin' to foreclose that mortgage and turn poor Nancy Auld out of house and home in her helpless old age!"

The bulbs dropped from the basket in Ruth's hand and spilled on the ground unheeded. "Oh, Mrs. Green, that can't be true! Even Donaldson can't do such a dreadful, heartless act as that!" cried Ruth, indignantly. And knew, as she uttered the words, that it was true—and just what she had expected of Donaldson, really.

THEY went together into the warm, bright sitting-room, where a grate fire crackled cheerily. Ellen Hawtree's heart's desire was to keep up the fires, and she burned astonishing quantities of fuel in doing so, but Ruth could not find it in her heart to rebuke her for waste, knowing that poor Ellen had never before been truly as warm as she wished—"warm to the hollow," as she expressed it. Jacob Smithers did not believe in luxury, even the luxury of heat enough for his family; fires were always carefully and warily watched by him, and the drafts never left open in the air-tight stove; a grate was something too extravagant to be contemplated. No wonder that poor Ellen enjoyed an orgy of heat!

"Yes, he's goin' to foreclose," continued Mrs. Green, as she sank into a big chair and stuck out her toes to the blaze. "Ain't a grate fire the comfortin'est thing? And with a furnace, too, you'll be in clover. Only don't let Ellen Hawtree burn you out o' house and home makin' fires!"

It seemed that, as Donaldson and Mary Smithers were to be married soon, he wanted a home that was more roomy than the little two-room cottage he occupied. This, so Donaldson said, was the reason he had decided to take possession of the Auld house, which, when fixed up, would be a right decent place, where his wife, so he said to Mrs. Green's informant, could keep summer boarders and help with expenses.

"Said summer boarders in the village were always crazy about Tom's spring, and he aims to make into a reg'lar summer place," declared Mrs. Green, fanning herself, not from heat but from the oppression of boiling wrath.

"Father said," continued the visitor, "that maybe you could get Nancy Auld fixed up in Donaldson's cottage, and Tom might work—"

"I can," interrupted Ruth. "I can give them the cottage, but Donaldson has a contract for five years as my manager, with salary, and I am not able to get him to break it—I've tried. Besides, I doubt very much if Tom would want to stay where he would have to see Donaldson every day; that is asking too much of him. But we will see, Mrs. Green. I'll write right away to my guardian, Mr. Gary, and I am sure if there is a way out he can find it for us. Now I'm going to have Ellen make us a cup of coffee—tea isn't strong enough to suit the occasion!"

RUTH wrote to her guardian, and received a telegram: "Coming on next train," which comforted her much.

"There is nothing like a man to help one out of difficulties," sighed Ruth, thankfully, "if," she laughed, "he happens to a dependable one like Mr. Gary."

Mr. Green brought him up from the station, and Ruth had the daintiest little lunch imaginable ready; she made him eat it, and drink a cup of coffee warranted to dispel the gloom of an anchorite before she allowed him to speak of business. Instinct, perhaps, aided her to judge of man's dependence upon creature comforts.

When the coffee was finished, Ruth told him all about the case of Donaldson. At the end of the story he laughed.

"My dear, how like a woman!" he teased, "to want to deny to poor Donaldson, getting old and very lonely, the presence of a young wife at his fireside—and a few bawbees in his pouch on account of summer boarders. Now, honestly, is it fair to want Tom, who is young, and reasonably good-looking—"

"Oh, don't, dear Mr. Gary, don't!" implored his ward. "I know you are teasing, but—well, there is nothing I can say that is good about Donaldson except that he is industrious. Not a

SIX LITTLE DOGS

By Margaret E. Sangster

SIX little dogs in a basket sat;
They were black and white, and were, oh! so fat
That they couldn't move from their narrow beds
(Except their paws, and of course their heads).
So they sat and sat—they were oh! so fat!
Six little dogs—just think of that!

SIX little dogs in a basket sat;
They were, oh! so soft that you liked to pat
Their little heads, and their eyes were bright;
And they couldn't move, they were packed so tight!
So they sat and sat (They were very fat);
Six little dogs—just think of that!

SIX little dogs in a basket sat,
When running by came a big gray cat;
And they tried to chase, but they couldn't go
(And a puppy dog is a cat's worst foe!)
For the basket was tight, and they were fat;—
Six little dogs—just think of that!

Peace with Germany

IN ADOPTING the Knox resolution declaring the state of war between the United States and Germany and Austria-Hungary at an end, the Senate took a step which had long been foreseen. Whether it will eventuate in our government's acceptance of the Versailles Treaty, with possible modifications and the elimination of the League covenant, or in a separate treaty, has yet to be decided. During the discussion, Senator Lodge gave the impression that the Versailles Treaty would not be resubmitted, but that a separate peace would be concluded.

On the other hand, it is strongly urged that the view expressed by President Harding, in speaking to Congress on April 12, that "it would be idle to delay for separate peace treaties with the Central Powers on the assumption that these alone would be adequate," should govern America's action in the matter, for the reason, as the President went on to explain, that in our peace engagements we "can not ignore the old-world relationship and the settlements already effected, nor is it desirable to do so in preserving our own rights and contracting our future relationships." He held that "the wiser course would seem to be the acceptance of the confirmation of our rights and interests as already provided and to engage under the existing treaty," assuming that this could be done by such reservations as might be deemed necessary to secure us from undesirable pledges and "to safeguard our essential interests."

These are plain words and seem to point clearly to a straightforward and unobjectionable way of accomplishing all that is necessary in the circumstances; and that to change front now and adopt a separate peace treaty would be liable to be looked upon as a studied severance of those relations which have existed between the Allies and this government from the date of our participation in the war until the present time. To the average American mind, the situation in the Senate seems to be heading toward a revival of the old struggle to limit or interfere with the treaty-making power of the Executive—a struggle which rose to an embarrassing pitch during the last administration.

The Christian Herald is not a political paper and wastes no time in the discussion of partisan politics. We believe, however, that we express the general sentiment of the people when we affirm that any course of action which would shake the confidence of those on whose side we fought in the war, and lead them to question the good faith and honor of this nation, or which would tend to alienate international friendship, would be singularly unfortunate at this time.

President Harding has won the hearty approbation of all citizens by his wise and moderate course under very trying conditions. The nation trusts him and looks to him as its Executive to continue as he has begun, regardless of partisan clamor, and to hold the helm with the same firm, able and dignified grasp he has already shown.

Delaying Readjustment

IN THE latest published review of general business and financial conditions, the Federal Reserve Board squarely puts the blame for keeping up high prices at the door of the retailers. Contributing causes are found in high wage levels, heavy transportation charges and the cost of coal; but even these the Board regards as quite insufficient to justify the course of the retailers, who keep on profiteering while other branches are doing their share to help readjustment by lowering rates as far as conditions permit.

By way of illustration, it is shown that while the cost of raw material generally has declined 11 per cent. since January, the retailers' figures show a drop of only 3 per cent. Foodstuffs at retail showed an average decline of only 1 per cent. in 42 different articles during March. In April, with a marked improvement in the business situation everywhere, the retailers still refused to budge to any perceptible degree. At the present time, with comparatively few exceptions, the same situation exists. In many important lines the anomaly is presented of something like an approximation of pre-war prices in the wholesale trade, while the retail is being conducted "at twice or even more than twice 1913 values."

These are conditions which need no comment. It is a time when all branches of business should unite in bearing their just proportion of the lowering of values which is essential to a return to normal conditions. While the general outlook continues encouraging, its full development can not be reached until all the industries do their share towards lifting the burden.

On Keeping Well

KEEPING well is a duty as well as a necessity if we are going to be of real service to the world and happily enjoy life.

Many people regard their bodies with indifference until they get sick. Then they rush with alarm to a drug-store for patent medicines, or anxiously search for remedies, all the way from sanatoriums to sea voyages. Also many other people live in such constant fear of sickness that they are sick half the time.

Another large group of human beings is living under the false impression that sickness and disease are very common and therefore unavoidable. As a matter of fact, the last authentic figures from the United States Bureau of Health, giving the facts from the registration areas which cover three-fourths of the entire country, show that the annual deaths from all causes in the United States are 1,096,436, a percentage of only 12.9 per thousand. Only 4 persons out of 1,000,000 died of smallpox. The chances that any one who reads this will die of typhoid fever this year are about as great as his committing suicide.

The great scourges of history are being wiped off the map of human suffering. Smallpox, typhoid, scarlet fever, diphtheria, yellow fever, and even cholera, have been to a great degree arrested and conquered.

There are simple rules of keeping well which people may obey.

Study your bodies and take as good care of their mechanism as you do of a new automobile.

Have careful examination of all the body by a good physician.

Study diet and effect of food. Eat less. More people die of gluttony than of starvation, in America.

Work hard at some useful toil.

Sleep as much as your system needs.

Exercise in ways that your body needs.

Have a purpose in life so great that your mind and body are fully absorbed in it.

Cast out fear. Love God and your neighbor. Nothing is so healthy as the creed of Jesus. Ask God to help you keep well and get well and stay well, using all the means that are in the world for a sound mind in a sound body and a sound spirit.

And above all, have faith in a good God who does not rejoice in human sickness, but loves to see His children sane and sound and happy.

Concerning Reparations

CONCERNING the technical details of the just and necessary payment of Germany to the Allies, and especially to France, for the frightful ruin caused, the Christian Herald has no opinion. Even the Allies themselves are not agreed on the details as to the exact amount of reparations that Germany should make.

But there is one reparation which is more important than billions of gold, or even the rebuilding of villages and ruined territory.

That reparation is the acknowledgment on the part of the German Government of wrong committed, and a real repentance on the part of the people for her share in bringing on the tragedy.

M. Briand recently declared, commenting on the whole reparation dispute:

"Only good-will and good faith are needed to enable Germany to fulfil the disarmament clauses of the Treaty, but she has neither good faith nor good-will, and she plans revenge in her heart. We have got to show her that it does not pay to plan revenge. The way she has behaved about disarmament justifies alone the steps we are going to take."

Does it not seem strange that through all the turmoil and discord which have followed the war, the nations have not yet learned the lesson that God would have them learn?

What are all the money reparations in the world worth without a repentant and humble heart? What avail to pour gold into the lap of a conquering country, if the heart that gives it pours out hate and ill-will? Of what avail, so far as the future is concerned, will all reparations be to secure the world against future wars, if the heart and purpose are unchanged?

What doth the Lord require? Are His claims less than those of France, of Great Britain? Reparations! Yes, but the reparation of a contrite spirit that bows before the Eternal and asks forgiveness—that, and that only, will repair the wrong and pay for the damage.

Gold can not settle for wrong. Only repentance can pay the debt of sin.

Startling Divorce Figures

IN a comprehensive and enlightening article on the growth of divorce, Bishop Moreland of Sacramento has shown that "easy divorce is the subtle poison which is corrupting the ideals of family life" in all the States, and gradually undermining the Christian conception of marriage as a sacred and honored institution. In some sections the divorces outnumber the marriages. In the last two decades, the annual total of divorces in the entire country has more than doubled, the figures for 1920 showing 132,753, as against 61,698 in 1901. In these twenty years 1,183,501 couples were legally separated and 1,318,514 children were deprived of home training and those wholesome moral surroundings which are the birthright of every child born in lawful wedlock. The grand total of "damaged goods" turned out by the divorce mills he estimates at five and one-half million individuals, children and grown-ups together!

Those States in which the evil is most prevalent would form a black belt right across the center of this continent, including eleven States, in which more than half the divorces are granted, namely, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri, Kentucky, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Tennessee and Texas. The leading States in "easy divorce," according to the Bishop's figures, are Nevada, Oregon, Washington, New Hampshire, Idaho, Wyoming, Oklahoma and Montana.

What is the remedy for this startling deterioration of the social and religious life of the nation which threatens the disintegration of the American home? There are a few States which have honored themselves by safeguarding the integrity of the home through legislation which renders divorce far less easy than in other States, where the object of legislation seems to have been to afford every facility for disuniting the marriage tie.

Bishop Moreland, having studied the whole situation with painstaking thoroughness, intimates that he may have a sequel to his enlightening article, in which he will doubtless review the moral and religious aspects of the situation, and may suggest some practical way of minimizing the evil. In the face of such a showing, can the churches afford to remain silent?

Free Course for the Word

LIKE the mercury in the thermometer, the spirits of the average man rise or fall with every little fluctuation of fortune or its opposite in daily life. As with individuals, so with communities and nations. The Montreal Witness, referring to the fact that the Bible is still the "best seller" of all the books in the world, makes this observation:

"That would be a splendid fact if it meant that those Bibles were read. The Church Times of London says a generation is for the first time growing up without any knowledge of the first facts of the New Testament, and that England is drifting perceptibly into paganism. With this agreed the reports of the war chaplains who found that a very large proportion of the men at the front knew nothing about the Christian religion. We should like to think with the Church Times that it was thus for the first time. . . . It is perhaps true, however, that there never was a time when religion occupied so small a place in the mind of the people in proportion to the other things which now crowd upon their attention and enliven their lives."

While it is doubtless true that there are many unread Bibles and many—far too many—Bibleless homes, nevertheless we have good reasons for believing that there is today a far larger proportion of Bible readers in civilized lands than ever before.

Everyone seeks to be well informed, and it is not a difficult matter in this particular connection to get gratifying facts from the sources of Bible production, and also from the homes of the people themselves. The Christian Herald has been conducting an inquiry on both lines, and finds that the output of Bibles is very greatly in excess of former years. We have also been astonished at the very large number of assurances received through the mails, showing that the Family Altar is still one of the bulwarks of Christian life and character in thousands of American homes.

The Prayer League, which reaches out to almost every section of our land, has revealed the cheering fact that thousands feed daily upon the manna of the Word. And the numbers are still growing. The Bible and Prayer stand together.

Wait until the fog passes, brothers, and then take your Bible-reading census, and you will find that the grand old Book is not only still the "best seller," but far more widely read than you had supposed.

German Cabinet Resigns as Allies Issue Reparations Ultimatum

REFUSAL by the American Government to transmit the new German reparations offer to the Allies with its advice that Germany should at once "make directly to the Allied governments clear, definite and adequate proposals which would in all respects meet its just obligations," was followed speedily by other important developments in the reparations controversy.

One of the first of these was the calling to the colors in France of the class of 1919, which increased the strength of the French army by 200,000. While these were pouring into the depots, the older troops were marching into the occupied territory in Germany in order to be ready for the word to seize the Ruhr district, which had been decided upon as the next coercive measure in case Germany refuses to meet the Allied demands.

Meanwhile the Allied Supreme Council was drafting an ultimatum, but before it could be despatched the German cabinet, headed by Chancellor Konstantin Fehrenbach, had offered its resignation as a result of the failure of its appeal to the United States. President Ebert requested its members to continue to deal with current affairs, and they consented to do so. The President and the Reichstag leaders had sought to prevent the cabinet's resignation at this time as a futile move politically, and one which would only add to the confusion in Germany and create a bad impression abroad. The Majority Socialists declined participation in the new cabinet and it was expected the formation of a new ministry would devolve upon the present coalition group, made up of Clericals, the German People's Party, the Democrats and the Bavarian People's party. Dr. Gustav Stresemann, leader of the German People's Party and an advocate of more drastic resistance to the Allied demands, was the man most often mentioned for the Chancellorship.

The Allied ultimatum summoned Germany to reply categorically before May 12 whether she will perform her unfilled obligations under the Versailles Treaty, particularly as to the payment of reparations totaling 132,000,000,000 gold marks. In case of refusal, the Allies served notice that they would proceed with the occupation of the Ruhr valley "and to undertake all other military and naval measures." Germany also is required to pledge compliance with the disarmament stipulations and to proceed at once to the trial of war criminals.

Before the Allied Supreme Council ended its sessions in London it extended a formal invitation to the United States to appoint representatives to the Supreme Council, the Council of Ambassadors and the Reparations Commission. Colonel George Harvey, ambassador to Great Britain, was designated to serve on the Supreme Council; the ambassador to France will observe unofficially the work of the Council of Ambassadors; and Roland W. Boyden will sit again in an "unofficial capacity" on the Reparations Commission.

Poles Invade Upper Silesia

ORGANIZED Polish forces, estimated to number 20,000, have engaged in a new adventure which recalls their seizure of Vilna and the Italian occupation of Fiume. With the Allies delaying their decision regarding the final disposition of Upper Silesia, the Poles crossed the border in force and occupied the southern tip of the province on a line from Kosel to Tarnowitz, only a few of the larger towns remaining independent of their control. The rural population in this section is largely Polish, but the Germans are in a majority in the towns.

The Polish invasion, which gradually was being extended toward the north, brought the Poles into conflict with the Allied forces who have been maintaining order in the disputed province and there were numerous casualties. At Gross-Strehlitz, the British control officer opened artillery fire on 2,000 or 3,000 Poles who were attempting to occupy the city, and at Rybnik there was a battle lasting several hours between the Poles and Italian troops. The Allied forces were inadequate, however, to afford adequate resistance to the Polish advance.

Despatches from Warsaw announced that Poland had closed the frontier adjoining the invaded district and declared that the Polish Government had been taken completely by surprise by the movement. Observers in other countries were skeptical that an invasion of such magnitude could have been carried out without official connivance, and this suspicion was not removed by the recall of Adalbert Korfanty, the Polish plebiscite commissioner, who assumed the leadership of the movement.

The pretext for the Polish invasion was a rumor that the Inter-Allied Plebiscite Commission had recommended the awarding to Poland of only the Pless and Rybnik regions in southeastern Silesia. This rumor never has been confirmed, and Allied officials denied emphatically that any decision regarding the division of Upper Silesia had been reached.

The Place and Power of Prayer

A Sermon by REV. J. A. McAFEE, D.D.*

TEXT—I John 5:14. "And this is the boldness which we have toward him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us."

AND such a boldness it is! Surely we would not dare come unto Him at all, if we had not seen Him revealed in Jesus Christ. Surely we would not come with any confidence, if we had not known His love, shown forth in the gift of His Son, our Lord. To come before Almighty God, the Maker of heaven and earth, is a bold thing; to come before Him expecting Him to hearken unto our cry is doubly bold. Yet, without fear and in all expectation, the follower of the Christ comes before the Eternal Creator.

Prayer is axiomatic in any religion worthy of the name. It is elemental in the life of every man. By whatever name it may be called, there is a yearning of every soul for companionship with the higher powers. In the Christian this natural yearning has come to its ripe fruition in communion with God, the Father.

It is not a careless statement which John makes in his letter. There are two qualifications: "And this is the boldness which we have toward Him, that if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us." Our asking must be "according to His will," and, even when so made, it does not follow that He will answer as we would have Him, but only "He heareth us." Though we grow petulant and impatient, we know that it is better so.

We, ignorant of ourselves, beg often our own harms, which the wise powers deny us for our good; so we find profit, by losing of our prayers."

We do not come to God with a fanatical belief that He stands ready to grant our slightest wish; that prayer is for us a sort of Aladdin's lamp by which we can gain our desires. We have no words of Scripture which justify such a view. "And this is the boldness which we have toward Him, that if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us."

The God revealed to us in Jesus Christ is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God. Every believer should know the place and power of prayer. Better, he should give it place in his life, that he might know its power.

PRAYER is communion with the Heavenly Father. Prayer must never deteriorate into a mere recital of our needs and desires, a catalog of our requests. God does not need the information which we alone can give. The Master said to His followers: "For your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." You and I today fail to find the power of prayer because it becomes the mere reiteration of our requests, and we do not come into communion with our Creator.

Prayer must never become the price paid for the good will of God. Divine blessing must never be a quid pro quo, with the extent of the blessing dependent directly upon the length of the prayer. The poor, ignorant woman mumbles her prayers and counts her beads, thinking that the oftener the prayers are numbered off, the more graciously God will look down upon her.

Just how easy it is to take such a view of prayer is shown by the remark of a small boy. The lad made earnest request to his mother that he be allowed to go to sleep under the bed. When pressed for a reason, he replied that if a robber came in the night he would look for him in the bed and would find him easily, while he would not think to look under the bed. The mother asked the boy if he did not pray every night that God would watch over him during the night. The child replied "Yes," and seemed to be satisfied. The mother went on reading and in a little while the youngster asked her if it were not light about four o'clock every morning. She replied that she guessed it was. Then the lad said: "Well, I just pray to God to watch over me in the night and a robber might come after four o'clock." In the thought of the child, the prayer must be altered, if God were going to watch over him after day-break. We do not put the thing quite so baldly. In many cases that is due to the fact that we do not think as clearly as the boy. We do have a feeling that the blessing of God will be in direct ratio to the amount of our prayer. To us who so think Jesus has something to say. "But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking."

PRAYER is the meeting-place of our spirits with Him who is Spirit. It is the faith of the Christian that there is such a meeting-place, and that, not alone can we come making known our desires and our needs to Him, but that, too, we can hear Him speaking to us. It is for us in prayer to train our hearts to hear and to understand His voice. Our understanding must not be dulled, as was that of the boy Samuel, who perceived not that the voice which spoke to him was the voice of the Lord.

In prayer it is God who must be sought. It is not things we seek primarily, but God. When we have found Him our prayers have been answered. It is communion with the Eternal that our hearts crave. It is a bold thing to say, but the Christian has that communion with the Infinite in prayer.

"Not Thy gifts I seek, O Lord;
Not Thy gifts, but Thee.
What were all Thy boundless store
Without Thyself, what less or more?
Not Thy gifts, but Thee."

Prayer has its untold influence upon our own spirits. It cannot be but that we shall come away from a time of communion with the Heavenly Father changed men and women. If it were only for this reflex influence prayer would be eminently worth while. Tennyson was not using idle words when he

"Lord, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in Thy presence will prevail to make;
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take;
What parched ground refresh as with a shower!
We kneel, and all about us seems to lower;
We rise and all the distant and the near,
Stand forth in sunny outline, brave and clear.
We kneel, how weak! we rise, how full of power!
Why, therefore, should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others, that we are not always strong;
That we are ever overborne with care,
Anxious and troubled, when with us is prayer,
And joy and strength and courage are with Thee?"

Prayer is a constructive force. Prayer as meditation is good, but the Christian belief does not stop with that. "And this is the boldness which we have toward Him, that if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us." Prayer has been called "The priceless human contribution to the Kingdom," and "The highest creative function of personality." We must never come to look upon prayer as pious meditation alone. When we do that we have not yet discovered the place and power of prayer.

Very simply, the Christian belief is that in prayer the believer sets in motion spiritual forces, releases spiritual powers, that would not be set in motion or released apart from his prayers. By his prayer the Christian enables God to do things in the world that would be impossible otherwise.

There is nothing in this belief that in any way contradicts the best-authenticated discoveries of science. The scientist cannot, and for the most part would not care to deny the existence of spiritual forces. He may be blinded to them, as were the eyes of the young man with Elisha to the cloud of chariots and horsemen round about the city. The eyes of the Christian are opened and by his prayer he puts those spiritual forces in operation. It is the conviction of the Christian heart that prayer is a great constructive force—the greatest constructive force which the Church or individuals have at their disposal.

WHAT would happen if this thing, with all its implications, once became fixed in our hearts? What a change it would make!

A few days ago I was talking to a thoughtful layman. We were talking of the ever-vexatious problem of the midweek service. He gave me it as his opinion—and I cherish greatly his opinion on any subject—that we were making a mistake in not making of those services what they are usually called "Prayer Meetings." He felt that if our Church members could be brought to the thoroughly Christian view of prayer as a constructive force, they would be found in the services. Frankly now, did it ever occur to you that in prayer you are exerting an influence that is felt around the world? Did it ever occur to you that the greatest thing you can do for the kingdom of God is to pray—not repeat some words—but pray?

If we realize that, we would meet together, as a serious business, to put into operation those forces which would reach to the uttermost parts of the earth.

The place and power of prayer are fundamental to the Christian faith. It is one of the golden threads in the fabric of our faith. It is a power, not alone to strengthen and purify our own hearts; but it is the "priceless human contribution to the Kingdom!"

KITTY WOOD KUMARAKULASINGHE of Newara Eliya, Ceylon, writes to the Christian Herald of great evangelistic meetings held by the Salvation Army in the Malayalam country, India, with remarkable results. She thus describes them:

"The Commissioner is preaching to the people gathered in the first center of the Malayalam village districts. Before us are sitting on the ground eight or nine hundred people. Two other addresses follow. And now the praying has begun. It is like the sound of many waters. A great many seekers have come forward, I do not know how many. And now the women have come and another great volume of prayer rises. I cannot describe it. It has the spirit of heaven. I see tears flowing on many faces, and there are tears in my own eyes. They are believing and rise with shining faces. This will spread back to the villages where they come from."

"At Niyattincherri on Sunday, more than double our other crowds assembled, nearly 3000 people. A great many people are listening, and—wonder of India—nearly half the congregation are women! One will have to travel far to hear such praying—thousands calling upon God with all their hearts. Truly these were the most wonderful meetings of my life."

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus Shall Reign Where'er the Sun," or "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Mark 12:28-34. The "Great Commandment."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 375, first column).

Sermon—"THE PLACE AND POWER OF PRAYER"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League

Closing Hymn—"My Faith Looks Up to Thee," or "Come, Thou Almighty King."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Our gracious Father, we would be worthy of Thy parting grace and ask it may abide with us, to comfort and inspire and encourage us along the path of duty and of temptation and struggle, until we meet to recount the goodness of the Lord as we have met Him in the Way. AMEN.

said: "Solitude is the Mother-country of the strong." Great men and women have ever been the men and women who knew the power of that solitude—alone with Him.

Prayer has a quieting, strengthening influence upon our spirits. An article which appeared in one of the American magazines a few months ago illustrates this. The article, written by a business man, tells of the visit of a friend who asks him the secret of his serenity and freedom from worry. He in turn asks his friend if he has never met other men from whom he seemed to draw strength and courage and faith, who were as a reservoir of power. The friend acknowledges that he has met a few such, but bemoans the fact that in life there are so few. The business man says: "In this respect I am very fortunate; it's the secret of my taking things as easily as I do. There is such a Friend right here in this establishment, whose companionship has meant everything in the world to me. When things are crowding me pretty hard, I simply stop short and shut my door and talk to Him for a few minutes."

"He's a very wonderful friend," he concluded. "I couldn't get through the business day without Him." "He must be," the visitor assented. "I'd like to meet him. What's his name?"

Though the other doubted if he could make his friend understand, he said: "He's the Senior Partner in this business, and His name is God!"

PRAYER has a purifying influence upon our spirits. Somehow, by His greatness, our own littleness is done away; by His purity, some of our impurity is washed out. I can do no better than to put it in the words of Bishop Trench:

The Resources of a Great Apostle

SUNDAY, PHIL. 1:19. "For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayers and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ."—It is good to be permitted to turn into a strong man's life and to examine his resources. It is a great privilege to be allowed to look into his treasury from which he gets his current coin to meet the urgent demand of circumstances. And that is our privilege with the Apostle Paul.

Here is the great apostle in captivity at Rome. The greatest of all itinerant missionaries is now in bonds. He has roamed at large on enterprising ventures in the cause of the Kingdom of God. He has trudged through Asia Minor and through lands still more remote. He has crossed icy-cold mountains and fever-haunted plains. He has been a torch-bearer for the Kingdom of Light, and genial fires have been kindled in every place in which he has ministered. And now he is in bonds. The missionary is a captive. The torch-bearer is confined. It looks as if his work is over. But no! To this man the imprisonment of the body is not the paralysis of the soul. Even a blind alley may be a mystic thoroughfare. A chain may be the witness of a nobler freedom. A prison may be the birthplace of heavenly springs. That is his faith, and on what does he rely? "I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayers and the supply of the Spirit of Christ."

And so the Apostle finds a gracious part of his resources in the prayers of others. And so it comes to pass that apparent weaklings can be the companions of mighty warriors. That is how the man with one talent can be the invisible helpmeet of the man with ten. Even a child can bring succor to the Apostle Paul. This is the supreme application of the old fable—the mouse can liberate the lion. We can, by prayer, liberate the powers of great men and women, and make them mighty masters of difficult circumstances. We can, by prayer, impart to them a sovereignty, by which they are able to handle circumstances and turn them to be ministers of salvation, to the glory of the Saviour's name.

I can, by prayer, become as a part of another man, and I can go forth with him to his battles and his conquests. I can travel through Mongolia with James Gilmour, and I can help him to be light-hearted in the midst of appalling tasks. I can be part of a statesman's personality when he is fighting some great iniquity, or championing the children of oppression. I can be a great companion of some mighty preacher, when he stands in the pulpit, and I can multiply his resources when he proclaims the word of life.

Yes, I can, by prayer, league myself with another, and I can be a mighty helpmeet in giving him conquest-over circumstances so as to make them the ministers of salvation. In this way Onesimus can be a part of Paul, Aquila can be a part of Apollos, and any child can be a part of any great campaigner in the warfare of the Kingdom of God.

Prayer is the appointed means by which rivers of energy are unsealed and directed to some crying needs. And therefore vital prayer is not a word, it is an act. It is as much an act as the waterman's lifting of a sluice-gate which lets the higher waters into the lock where the waters are low. Prayer prepares the ways for the supply of the Spirit of Jesus, and in that holy energy we have the power which overmatches and conquers difficulties which are otherwise invincible.

The Neglected Book

MONDAY, Psa. 119:11. "Thy Word have I hid in my heart." It is related in Pilgrim's Progress that Christian was met at the foot of the Cross by three angels who presented him with a name, a white garment and a roll with a royal seal upon it. He found much comfort in reading from this roll until, coming to a pleasant arbor, he fell asleep and lost it.

As he continued his journey, meeting with many dangers, he felt in his bosom for the roll "that he might read therein and be comforted"; but it was not there! "Then was he in great distress; for he wanted that which used to relieve him and which should have been his pass into the Celestial City."

At last he bethought himself of the arbor wherein he had slept; and asking God's forgiveness for that foolish act, he retraced his steps. "All the while crying, 'O that I had not slept!'" But coming to the arbor he espied his roll, which, with trembling, he caught up and put into his bosom. And who can tell how joyful this man was; for that roll was the assurance of his life!

Get back your Bible, my friend. Take it down from the shelf where it lies covered with dust. If while sleeping you have lost it, seek and keep on seeking until you find it.

The Heart of a Child

TUESDAY, I John 3:1. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us." Eva said to Topsy in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Oh, Topsy, poor child, I love you! I love you because you haven't any father or mother or friends, because you have been a poor, abused child." The eyes of the black child were filled with tears; large drops fell on Eva's white hand. The darkness of Topsy's heathen soul had been made bright with the rays of love. Does not the voice of Christ's love whisper to every troubled child, "I love you, I died for you; My arms are open to you. Come unto Me and rest in My bosom."

Is not a child the masterpiece of God's creation, and is not our loving and caring for the least of these little ones manifesting our love to Him? Is not feeding and watching over the millions of hungry, homeless children in Europe, doing work for Him Who gave Himself for us? Are the thoughtless rich heedless of the cry of the children? Then they are forgetting Him, the Inasmuch Redeemer. Does not every child possess unknown powers of usefulness and greatness? Our help may plant seeds of kindness that will grow into flowers and fruits for the Paradise of God. Those we aid may be the ones who will receive us into heavenly habitations.

If earth is crammed with heaven and if every common bush is afire with God, how much more is childhood full of infinite possibilities. Is it not holy ground where children are walking? Should we not take off our shoes as we mingle among them? The need and comfort, education and training of playful childhood are now and here and everywhere around us. Is not every day a vessel into which we may pour our love to quench the thirst of childhood?

The Great Companion

WEDNESDAY, Ex. 3:12. "Certainly I will be with thee." A young child thinks of God as a sort of omnipresent Watchman, vaguely trusted, vaguely feared, but seldom loved. Our first rhymed prayer is precious in memory, but it is hardly a model prayer for a devout and well-developed Christian. Years pass and the child is a schoolboy. His idea of God takes color from his experience in school. The great personality of the schoolroom is the teacher. A teacher assumes an aspect of divinity to the impressionable child—he knows so much and sees so much, and it is in his power to do so much. The teacher, too, is an incarnation of justice. There is an austerity that begets awe and a justice that begets reverence.

So, to the schoolboy, God is a great Teacher, a Master of Truth, the Supreme Authority in the realm of duty. After school comes the serious business of life. Now friendship bulks largely—helpful and disinterested friendship. Burdens grow heavy, crises come, and blessed is he who has a friend in times of need. Then, unless we lose our vision, God looms up on our mental horizon as the Infinite Friend.

As years fly by, with age come many disillusionments. We measure things differently. We have found out how few things we learned in school that were of any value, how few things we set our hearts on in youth were satisfactory, how few friends we trusted, in our prime were weatherproof. We take account of all these things and set high values on things that have never failed us. God has been with us all the way. He tempered our excess of joy. He consoled us in our sorrow. His Word was manna to our souls.

His promises are strong for us to lean on as we brace ourselves to enter the dark. What is God? An abiding Presence. An encompassing Presence. Is that a gulf I see yawning just ahead? Yea, a gulf. Then I shall surely fall. Yea! I shall fall, but I shall fall into His arms. And Oh! what arms. "Underneath are everlasting arms." "Certainly, I will be with thee."

The Fruitful Life

THURSDAY, I Col. 1:10. "Being fruitful in every good work." There has never been a year without its springtime and never will be. Like all good things and lovely it is worth waiting for. Snow and cold, east wind and frost are but a memory. Bird-song, flower-bloom, sunshine, bee-hum and brook-murmur are glorious realities. There is a sense of a general awakening and renewal everywhere. The spring season comes with special meaning to those who are studying the ways of God and who delight to dwell on His gracious blessings. The advent of summer brings its spiritual lessons as well as its material beauties.

The spring teaches us that if we would have fruit, we must first have blossoms. The order of nature is first blossoms, then fruit. First spring with its promise, then summer with its fulfilment. First planting time, then reaping time. Says the botanist: "The fruit is simply the enlarged matured pistil; much of the fleeting spring flower, indeed all that is essential to it, is made permanent in the enduring fruit." The fruit may be regarded as a more perfect blossom, retaining the grace and color, fragrance and form that distinguished the blossom, but adding the flavor that it lacked. We must have blossoms and tenderly care for them, if we would see them mature into fruit.

And what are those blossoms that shall beautify the summer and autumn of our lives? They are high ideals, noble aims, great ideas, constructive thoughts, worthy ambitions, sincere intentions, "whatsoever things are lovely." As we think, so we are. The desires that control our hearts give direction to the path selected by our feet. There are laws of sowing and reaping, cause and effect, choosing and consequence.

It is impossible to foster a bad cause and realize a good thing. Poor seed, immature buds, blighted blossoms result only in undesirable fruit and unwelcome harvests.

The Value of Central Thought

FRIDAY, II Kings 17:38. "The covenant that I have made with you, ye shall not forget." We sometimes say to one another, "Now, don't forget," but despite all warnings and admonitions, we do forget. Who has not learned to say with ease, "Oh, I forgot," when confronted with some neglect or sin of omission? Some very serious consequences have followed a lapse of memory. Our intentions were good. We had highly resolved to remember, but we never thought of it again.

Then there are some facts and responsibilities that are never long out of our minds. We can not escape their remembrance, try as we may. These thoughts come to us, apparently unbidden, and stay in spite of all attempts to drive them away. It is said that we are not responsible for the ideas that come to us, but for those that we keep; nevertheless it is a common experience that those we would keep run away, while others persist in returning.

We are not helpless, however, in these matters. We can control the center of attention, and the center finally determines the circumference. If we put a great regulative idea on the throne in our mental life, right thinking follows as night follows day. The One Great Thought brings a whole train-load of fine associates and puts to flight the numerous enemy-invaders. This explains why—"The Covenant that I have made with you, ye shall not forget!" If we keep this one thing uppermost in our mind, our problem is solved. Which is only another way of saying, "Seek ye first the Kingdom and all other things are added."

The Cure for Fear

SATURDAY, Ps. 56:3. "What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee." Perhaps some one may ask the question "Why should we fear?" Much as we should like to be without this very undesirable quality, and in spite of the fact that we feel ashamed at times even to confess that it is there—still, there it is. And it is not that we are afraid as to the ultimate outcome, but the "lions by the way." There is the lion of our own weakness, and this seems like a contradiction of terms; but some one who has been tormented and torn by the feeling that he was not sufficient unto the day, and who has seen the spectre of defeat rise up before him, will never say that one's native weakness is not a devouring lion. Then there is the lion of past failures to strike terror into the heart of the one who would win out. And once again, the lion who is our arch-enemy.

Enough to make one afraid! Imagine waging warfare against a trinity like this! Who may hope to win out in the face of such an array?

But listen to what the prisoner among the Philistines has to say! He does not for a moment overlook the fact that fears arise, and that prison walls shut out the faces of his friends and loved ones; but in this hour of his extremity he says, "I will trust in Thee." He does not say that he would sit down in philosophic calmness and reason the thing out, for he knew full well that he would come into deep waters; neither does he assume the part of the stoic, nor does he try to rally his own fainting courage for the occasion; but, with a faith so simple that it is almost too grand for us to understand, he settles the whole matter with these words, "I will trust in Thee."

"When obstacles and trials seem Like prison walls to be,
I do the little I can do,
And leave the rest to Thee."

Welch's

"THE NATIONAL DRINK"

THE drink that reflects the health of all outdoors—Nature's drink.

WELCH'S is the pure juice of full-ripe, luscious Concord grapes. Drinking a small glass of it gives you all the richness, all the food elements and all the health-building qualities of a big bunch of grapes fresh from the vine.

When served "straight", WELCH'S should be chilled and sipped from small glasses. It is an excellent fruit course for breakfast. A glass each day promotes health.

For a longer drink, and for social occasions, WELCH'S may be blended with plain or charged water in a hi-ball, or with ginger ale or lemonade. In a punch, WELCH'S adds color, body and most delightful taste.

The value of WELCH'S as a drink is the value of fresh fruit in the diet. Not only does it quench thirst, but it gives vigor without reaction. It has a value far beyond mere flavored beverages.

WELCH'S has been the quality grape juice since 1869.

Say Welch's and get it.

Specify Welch's distinctly at Club, Restaurant or Fountain. For home use, ask your grocer, druggist or confectioner to supply you — by the bottle or the case.

A Bird in Bryant Park

I WAS going through Bryant Park at the noon hour yesterday with a certain girl who is usually my lunch-companion.

We were walking very slowly in the sunshine, underneath the green branches of the park trees, and we were both of us, I think, trying to imagine that we were in the country. For Bryant Park is such a fresh little oasis, in the center of the city, that it is apt to make the mind turn toward thoughts of daisy-dotted fields, and wide, white clouds, and radiantly fresh air.

We were walking slowly in the sunshine when we became suddenly conscious of a crowd ahead of us—quite a dense crowd, even for a city park at noontime, where crowds are sometimes rather hard to plow through. And because we were utterly human—and therefore intensely curious—we hurried as fast as ever we could. And in a moment we were standing upon the outskirts of the crowd.

Almost anything in a great city will draw a crowd. Sometimes an airplane floating above the jagged line of the skyscrapers will make a thousand people pause in their way and stand—with thrown-back heads and staring eyes—for a quarter of an hour. An automobile with a bad tire, or a fire-engine, or a street speaker, or a new dress style, or an argument between two newsboys will in no time at all make a throng collect, a throng that will nearly block traffic. And so we, standing on the outskirts of the crowd, expected to see almost anything—except the sight that we did see!

SOMETIMES, on their way up from the South, strange birds pass over New York. When I say "strange birds," I mean birds that are unfamiliar to city-dwellers—for we are used only to small-brown sparrows, and an occasional robin red-breast, and exceedingly domesticated pigeons. And so, when we saw what was in the center of the crowd we, too, felt a thrill of surprise and interest. And we crowded close to get a good view of it.

It was a large bird that the people were watching, and it had a fairly long bill and short slender legs. It was shaped, just a bit, like a cockatoo—the sort that one sees in the wide window of a bird store. It was brown in color, of a slightly different, infinitely softer shade than the aforementioned sparrow, and the top of its head was crowned with a vivid crimson. I had never seen a bird like it, and the girl who is usually my luncheon companion said that she hadn't, either. Indeed, I doubt if there were a great many people in the absorbed group who were familiar with such a bird!

I looked around the circle of the crowd—we had worked our way into the center of it—with a very real interest. A silent crowd it was, and an intensely appreciative one. Silent, because it did not want to frighten away the shy visitor, appreciative, because of the utter trust that the visitor showed! And as I looked about the circle I seemed to see a certain spirit of friendliness upon every face—a certain expression of goodwill and good fellowship in eyes that might, ordinarily, have been hard.

A MAN—one of the vast army of men who are unemployed—was standing next to a woman who might have been an extremely efficient and

One Touch of Springtime Makes the Whole World Kin

smiled blandly from beside a frowsy and ill-kempt woman, who might have washed floors for a living. A mother, with a rosy child by one hand, smiled at a short-skirted shopgirl—who smiled back at her. And a minister looked down, through his tortoiseshell-rimmed glasses, into the face of a little boy who was quite obviously playing truant from school!

A typical conglomerate New York gathering it was, representing all nationalities, and all creeds, and all classes of society. A typical New York crowd—with all of the characteristics of our great melting-pot of a city. And yet, though every one of the crowd was of an entirely different type, one felt the kinship between them. And it was all because of a strange bird with soft, brown feathers and a scarlet top-knot—all because of one vivid living touch of springtime!

It isn't often that one is privileged to see this spirit of kinship. But when one does see it there is a certain thrill that comes—a certain heart-warming feeling that makes everybody in the world seem very near, and very kind. Sometimes, after a long, disappointing day, such a feeling will revive one's faith in human nature—will give one the strength and desire to carry on. Oftentimes it will build up a fabric of dreams and ideals; a fabric that has been allowed to grow thin and shabby and moth-eaten.

I have seen this expression of kinship on the faces of a crowd during wartime, when a regiment was leaving the city. I have seen long lines of women, shabby, and richly gowned; poor, and ill, and strong—I have seen women, young, and middle-aged, and very old, standing together. And the same heart-break and pain lay behind the gallant smile that each one of them managed to send to her boy, who was going away from her.

PEOPLE, underneath the artificial veneer that is the result of training or environment, are pretty much alike. They're made, fundamentally, of the same materials—they experience the same sensations and the same reactions. But people, most of them, are on their guard. For they have been taught, by the strange processes of civilization, to curb many natural impulses and to keep the veneer of training uncracked.

And yet it only takes something little and bright and friendly—like the bird in Bryant Park—to crack this seemingly unbreakable veneer. And if any one is fortunate enough to be present when the cracking is in progress, it's quite likely that the sight will stay close to that any one's heart!

It was a conglomerate crowd there in Bryant Park. But it was a silent, appreciative crowd—held together by a bond of very real sympathy. And, though I know that everybody expressed it differently, I was sure—as I looked from face to face—that each mind was mirroring the same thought that was in my mind.

I knew that everybody was thinking—though some of them were perhaps thinking almost subconsciously—of the miracle of springtime. And of the mercy and love and friendliness of the One who sends His brave little stranger birds into the very strongholds of the city!

JUST a little bird, in a city park,
But it came with the breath of spring—
And it made some souls, that were in the dark,
Creep out to the light, and sing.
It made the whole of the city day,
Seem sweeter and more worth-while;
And some of us wanted to kneel and pray,
And some of us had to smile!

Just a little bird with a scarlet head,
And a wonderful soft brown breast;
But it wakened dreams that were almost dead,
And it lulled some fears to rest. . . .
Just a little bird that did not belong
On the close-cropped city sod;
But back of the bird was Spring's throbbing song,

Making a Neighborhood Christian

International Sunday-School Lesson for May 29

Luke 10:25-37; Acts 2:44-47

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THE Christian Home, which was the subject for study last week, has at once extending relationships and these will be studied in the lessons for the remainder of the quarter. The scope should be noted now. First we will consider "Making a Neighborhood Christian," then "Making the Nation Christian," "Making the World Christian" and "Making the Social Order Christian." This broadening series of titles makes it important to keep within the limits of each subject. This time it is our "neighborhood" which is akin to Jerusalem in the great commission given by Jesus Christ.

Teaching by illustration was the method used by the Master Teacher in answering the question of the lawyer who sought to evade "love thy neighbor as thyself." The story of the unfortunate man who was set upon while on "the bloody way" going down from Jerusalem to Jericho was told, and it has been retold countless times since. The stories, or parables, related by Jesus will never be out of date. They are realistic and truth-teaching. None are more familiar than the Good Samaritan.

Wounds are sore and hope springs up as the traveler approaches; but an added sense of loneliness is experienced as the formalist passes onward with only a glance in the direction of the sufferer. The temple helper soon comes near, but seems to pacify his conscience after satisfying his curiosity. Will no one help! The Samaritan is the answer to the need which demands immediate attention. All that could be expected of any one is done, as he places the now encouraged man in the care of the inn-keeper, and then he goes the second mile as he says "whatsoever thou spendest more, I, when I come back again, will repay thee."

This Samaritan might have been expected to do something of this kind if the event had been located at Schechem, but this scene is laid in Judea where the Hebrew was not willing to even accord the Samaritan a place in the resurrection. The humanity of the Samaritan was not a matter of geography; rather it was a mere question of opportunity. When the ten lepers were cleansed by the Master, it was the Samaritan only who returned to say "Thank you." Today there are only a few more than 100 Samaritans at Nablous in Palestine, but the spirit of that Good Samaritan is reaching to the uttermost parts of this earth.

BEING a Christian means, in part, that the scales fall from our eyes and we see clearly the needs of others. This implies that we are obligated to more than a curious look-in upon the affairs of our community. Some people go slumming just for the sake of curiosity. They want thrills and hope they will see something awful. Rarely do the sight-seeing cars in our great cities carry through the various "towns" of different nationalities those who later return to help their brothers and sisters in the ceaseless struggle for a bare existence. On the other hand it is gladly stated that there was never a time in the history of the world when so much is being done for those who are in need as right now. Further, those who are seeking to follow the Christ do not wait till they stumble upon the wounded as they walk through life, but the sorrowing are sought out that help may be given them.

"Community" is one of the much-used words of today. The extension of the term is an index of the times in which we live: Community-sing, Community-betterment, Community-chest. Such words have no meaning where the Christ is not known and as He is accepted, they have an immediate application. It cannot be otherwise for He actually makes one brotherhood of all mankind. The early Church (see the passage in Acts) tried the plan of having all things in common. While this plan has not been generally followed, the obligation of stewardship, and helping "as any man has need," is growing in meaning. In many places rural churches are community-centers, to the great benefit of the entire neighborhood. Numerous books have been written on this special subject during the past decade, and they are worthy of study.

Right mental attitudes help much in neighboring. Jealousy and self-interest do not advantage at all. The three monkeys that are sculptured on the walls of a temple at Nikko, Japan, are well known, though not always heeded. They declare, by the hands over ears, eyes and mouth: "Hear no evil, see no evil, speak no evil." Any teacher who can get one of the little models, and they can be had for possibly fifty cents at a Japanese store, will have the basis for an impressive talk to the class. It would not be out of place to have this little group in every Sunday school or home. Few illustrations would be more effective for the smaller children. The writer has used these "Three Monkeys" for numerous children's sermons and even bought a cane in Tokyo with the monkeys carved on it. Of course it is more important to do what the monkeys teach than to carry them around with you. It takes a Christian to live up to such a standard, and when he does it, he is ready to see the good in others.

Some may wish to help a neighborhood and decide that they cannot because of the financial cost. There are many ways within the ability of every one. Let each class on Sunday give some attention to a purposeful discussion on the subject "What can we do to make our neighborhood Christian?" Soul-winning is one answer. Get the young people into your Sunday school who now stand on the street corners or who openly desecrate the Sabbath. Plan to hold Gospel services in parks or elsewhere Sunday afternoons during the coming summer.

THERE is a forceful application in connection with this parable of the Good Samaritan that is applicable to all. When one becomes conscious of a need and fails to engage in intercessory prayer, the sin of the priest and Levite is repeated. Samuel said to the people (I Samuel 12:23) "far be it from me that I should sin against Jehovah in ceasing to pray for you." More prayer for our neighborhood and especially for our neighbors, one by one, will work remarkable changes for good and to the glory of God. We work for those for whom we are praying.

The memory verse assigned to both the primary and junior departments is one that is essential for every age. It is "And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise" (Luke 6:31). The study of this Golden Rule will reveal many ways by which the neighborhood can be benefited. Always keep in mind that the survey of conditions is little more than negative in value unless something is done about it. The blessing comes not in knowing things, but in doing them.

In writing about the home last week, little was said concerning a large number of individuals in every community, namely, those who do not have a home. There are many in boarding or rooming houses near your church. Oh, how they need to be neighbored! Here is more work for individuals or classes. Seek them, invite them to church, Sunday school and prayer meeting; bring them to your church socials; have a community house of some kind where they can come. Make them want to share in all these things with you, your great objective being, of course, to win them to a saving knowledge of the Saviour and to help them live the Christian life. When the units are all Christian, there will be no question about the Christian neighborhood.

For Better Babies

AUNT BELLE has written a really great book—great because it goes to the very heart of the subject of baby culture. And how practical she is! No sentimental generalities—just matter-of-fact, common-sense advice on almost every problem that baffles young motherhood.

Her wonderful, reassuring, comforting first chapter tells how to prepare for the baby. Just this one chapter will mean health and sturdy growth to thousands of coming infants.

And then, chapter after chapter, she guides and counsels on each phase of baby's development—clothes, food, nursery furnishings, the first critical weeks, baby ailments, the bath, baby's skin, teeth, first steps, habits, weight, first aids—until the sturdy little youngster, romper clad, is larking with playmates—one more "Better Baby."

The book is carefully indexed, beautifully illustrated and contains charts, tables, etc.

It is a genuine delight to offer this wonderful book to mothers at a nominal price of 25 cents, because it is the appreciation of three generations of mothers which has made Mennen Borated Talcum known the world over as the perfect, safe, talcum for baby.

The edition is limited, so we advise sending 25 cents at once for your copy.

single thing! Dearest and best lawyer in the world, isn't there some way we can—can—

"Beat him out of his rights," laughed Mr. Gary, "that is what lawyers are supposed to be for, you know—to circumvent the right by chicanery of some sort."

But Ruth was properly indignant at this. She didn't want to cheat Donaldson of a penny; she wanted to know if there was not some way she might realize on something—maybe mortgage her own home, if nothing better offered, so that she might pay him and let him go; then, she was sure, Smithers might listen to reason.

"How about the mortgage Donaldson holds on Auld's place?" inquired Mr. Gary, and Ruth gasped with dismay to think she had forgotten that, the biggest factor of all. "And I don't suppose I could possibly get money enough to pay that, too, so that I could take it over, could I?" she queried, in distress.

"Well, you know the old house that Ned and his wife lives in belongs to you; and property has increased in value in that neighborhood, lately. If you sell it—"

"Mr. Gary!" cried Ruth, hotly, "do you imagine, for one minute, that I would sell Ned and Mrs. Shipp's home! I—I—didn't think," and Ruth stopped, sobs choking her voice.

MR. GARY walked round to Ruth's chair and deliberately took her in his arms, where he patted her head, which was hidden in his tangle of beard, and murmured soothing words.

"I didn't—indeed I didn't, honey! I was just teasing you, like the old gump that I am! No; you are too sweet and entirely unselfish to wish to harm anybody except yourself. And I, you know, am your guardian, appointed just for that purpose. But listen to me, little Ruth—sit here, close to me, where I can have the moral support of your hand to hold, while I tell my tale."

He led her passively to the little rocker beside his own armchair, placed her in it, seated himself, and taking her hand in his own, began:

"You see, dear, your grandfather had a whole heap of confidence in me, and, from the time your father and mother were drowned, he left me your guardian; making his will at that time, for he was not sure of a long life; and—well, he had seen the effects of wealth on your father and mother, child. They spent their time in travel, in luxuries that were hectic, unwholesome. When they died, as you know, there was nothing left; your grandfather had supported them, and he had never taught your father a profession—he simply spent the money his father had toiled for."

"Grandfather didn't tell me that, but I knew," nodded Ruth, soberly, "from things Ned let fall—and, and from instinct, I suppose; child as I was, I hated the life we led!"

"Yes; and your grandfather determined that you should be independent. The will he made he never altered, and it was left to my discretion to reveal its contents to you before you were of age, or to wait even later. You will be of age in a few months, but I won't wait till then—I'll tell you now, seeing that you have never disappointed any of us in your whole life, and that you are capable of making your own living, without a penny inherited, I am, nevertheless, going to tell you that you are quite able to pay off Donaldson and do a few other things besides. For you have inherited, from your grandfather's estate, and by the terms of his will, a sum sufficient to keep you in comparative comfort for quite a while—"

"Oh!" interrupted Ruth, eyes sparkling, joy radiating her happy face, "dear Mr. Gary, have I really some money of my own—how much—please, how much have I got?"

"Such a mercenary young person," nodded Mr. Gary, addressing a portrait of Ruth's grandparents which hung over the mantelpiece, "and you didn't guess it, did you, now? Young lady, you are sole heiress, and have come into, to have and to hold, dissipate or throw to the winds, as you like, the sum of—one million dollars!"

CHAPTER IX

RUTH was a purely normal girl, in every respect. A person who has an intellect sufficiently acute to grasp at once the meaning of a million dollars would be absolutely abnormal. Ruth, being just an ordinary mortal, sat dazed, blinking rather foolishly into Mr. Gary's kind old face, which was wreathed with happy smiles.

"Can't realize it, little girl?" he asked, gently, "can't realize that you are no longer a country girl who makes a bare living from her farm, her white Leghorns, and other like products, but a young lady of quality, who may hobnob with millionaires, if she so desire. What will you do with your money, little Ruth?"

"Mr. Gary," breathed Ruth, with a long sigh of awakening, "if you tell me the truth, and are not joking—as I don't believe you are—"

"No joke," vowed Mr. Gary, solemnly, "you have a million, with no strings tied to it. And I believe—or I wouldn't let you have it—that you are quite capable of using it, for the good of mankind."

"Ah!" there was a glad lilt to her voice, her eyes shone. "I can make, oh, so many people happy, Mr. Gary, if you let me think a little—and if you help me to think."

"Quite ready," nodded Mr. Gary, "let's spend your grandfather's money, some of it, as quickly as possible. But remember, I am not going to allow you to leave yourself penniless, young lady!"

"Penniless—with a million?" Ruth laughed happily. "Oh, Mr. Gary, I can't begin to think in millions, can you?"

"Just a matter of figures; nothing wonderful about it. Now go ahead—Tom Auld first, isn't it?"

"Yes—but Tom Auld won't let me help him, unless he is sure that I'm getting my money's worth. Dear guardian, I have been thinking, thinking, so much lately about how I would do, that I believe I have Tom settled. Donaldson says he wants Tom's place for a summer resort for boarders, and it is pretty—the spring and all the woodsy part. But Tom needs the house—how can I buy the spring part of his farm and give him enough to pay off Donaldson and still have a start, repair his old house, get new farm machinery, fertilize his land, and plant gorgeous crops. How can I do that? Well, this is the way I planned, if I had 'possessed the magic wand of great wealth' as poor Miss Emily says—ah—we are coming to Miss Emily next!"

"You visit Tom, tell him you have a client looking for a summer home, and buy it—and give him heaps and heaps of money for the land around the spring—no more."

"You don't want any of the credit of your good deed, Ruthie?"

"Oh—oh, no indeed! I wouldn't be known in it at all. You buy it for your supposititious client, and—and—Well, the truth is, I don't know what'll you do with it, after all."

"I'll build a bungalow on it for my grandchildren, who are weakly, if you don't mind," Mr. Gary laughed, "and rent the land from you."

"No, no—I'll give you the land, so gladly! That's a beautiful way out! But what about Donaldson?"

"I will interview Mr. Donaldson myself," said Mr. Gary, with a spark of anger in his eyes that would eventually wither Donaldson. "And now for Tom Auld—I'll wire for the money, and give Tom bills—I guess Donaldson would prefer hard cash."

POOR Nancy Auld, who must be guarded against shocks, knew nothing as yet of Donaldson's proposed foreclosure; she only knew that her darling boy was quiet and pale, and that he was so abstracted that he could hardly be interested in any of Nancy's prattlings of the day. With a mother's intuition, she knew something was wrong, and it worried her dreadfully for him to be silent—she knew it was to spare her.

Mother and son sat soberly before their little airtight stove, in the late afternoon, when Tom had returned from his work, and before he began the daily round of chores that closed the evening. Nancy was the first to hear voices—Ruth's, and another that was unfamiliar; but Ruth's was so brimful of joy that it fairly bubbled. Nancy, recognizing this, felt her own heart bound. Ruth was happy, therefore others would be.

"Nancy—Tom, I've the greatest news for you!" glowed Ruth, as she led Mr. Gary forward, keeping tight hold of his arm, as if she feared he would escape. "Mr. Gary, my guardian, has brought it. Tom, listen!"

And Tom and his mother listened, and heard all about the client, the summer bungalow, the spring, and the price—such a stupendous price that they could not grasp its magnitude, till Ruth carefully enlightened them, feeling all the possibilities of the wondrous sum.

They would sell the woodland—of course, and glad to. But—but it was too much, Tom was sure of that.

Mr. Gary laughingly assured him that his client was a millionaire, and that the price was a mere bauble.

So it was arranged; Tom was to receive his money the next day, when he could pay off the mortgage and attend to anything else of importance!

"I will," agreed Tom, promptly; "there's a matter of importance I'll tend to now, mother, if you'll excuse me—won't be gone but an hour or so, and I'll send old Mrs. Bryson, who's come back, to stay with you."

Such a firm, competent boy, this; so capable of doing things, with the magic wand of wealth in his possession! Ruth watched him with shining eyes as he swung briskly down the hillside that led into the road—he was going to see Mary!

IT WAS late, but Donaldson must still be seen! They found him, of all things, primping to go a-courting. Seated on his handkerchief, a blossom in his buttonhole, his shaggy hair greased smoothly, his blue suit brushed and his hat ditto. Donaldson was going to call on Mary—and Tom was already there! Ruth giggled with malicious glee to think of the downfall of this suitor, so confident and serene.

"Well, Donaldson, you are very much dressed up," greeted Mr. Gary, indifferently. "I'll have to ask you to postpone your visit, if you are going somewhere, for a few minutes, however. Tomorrow you will receive your full five years' wages, and you will immediately leave this farm. Get your things together tonight, Donaldson; Miss Carfax doesn't care to see your very hard-featured face any longer than she can help. Get out, and get quick—tomorrow!"

"I'll tak' the money, if it's in hard cash," agreed Donaldson, acutely, "but I—I winna want to leave just yet—I'm no ready to go in my ain house, yet. I'll agree to pay rent for this bit shanty," contemptuously.

"You couldn't pay enough rent—not your whole five years' wages, to induce Miss Carfax to allow you to remain here any longer than it'll take you to pack up and get out! And I'd advise you to remove yourself as far as possible from this neighborhood; there have been such things as—er—rides on a rail, with tar and feathers for decorations, you know. I'm not saying such will happen to you; I'm simply warning you! By ten o'clock in the morning you shall have your wages, and a truck will call for your goods. That is all."

And Mr. Gary swept Ruth away with an imperative hand. "I don't want you to come in contact with that toad," he declared, wrathfully; "don't give yourself any uneasiness—he'll go!"

"I am so glad!" sighed Ruth, contentedly. "Oh, I think it is so splendid to be a man!"

Mr. Gary laughed complacently. "We have our uses, honey—we have our uses. We can cuss, for instance, if it's strictly necessary, which is sometimes a relief. Well, anything else?"

"Miss Emily," said Ruth, promptly, "what about Miss Emily? How shall we go about waving our magic wand for poor Miss Emily?"

Mr. Gary listened while Ruth told him the little teacher's history. "What do you want to do for her?" he asked, when he had heard the whole story.

"Why, I want to give her money enough to buy her Old Home, and fix it up so that it will be livable. And I want her to go to Bermuda, right away, and eat oranges, and see the lily fields, and get rid of her rheumatism in the blessed sun. Now, pearl-of-great-price of a guardian, how shall I go about it?"

"Still anonymously?"

"Oh, yes, it would never do to let Miss Emily know! She'd starve before she would accept charity."

"A gift from a former pupil, nameless, of course," suggested Mr. Gary; but Ruth shook her head. "Miss Emily knows every pupil she ever taught; they all were natives of this village; and she wouldn't touch it—she'd think it charity, and spend all her time trying to find out the giver and return the gift."

"Some distant relative, perhaps?"

"Ah, there you have it! She has told me of an old gentleman from Wales, who once visited her aunt; their name, Miss Emily says, was Ap David, until they came to America. This man was Cousin David Ap David; she'd consider a legacy all right, from a relative."

"All right—here goes: The attorneys of David Ap David, deceased, of Wales, have notified Gary & Gary to deliver to Miss Emily David, of this state and county, a legacy left to her by the said David Ap David, deceased, being the sum of—how much?"

"Why, would, say—two thousand a year, and five thousand to buy back the old home be too much?" asked Ruth, timidly, naming the vast amount with bated breath. "It takes a lot of money to go to Bermuda—besides buying back the Old Home."

"I should say it would. Yes, it will be easy to spare two thousand; I'll notify Miss Emily of her gift tomorrow, after we are through with the others."

"I feel like a fairy godmother with a very important fairy godfather to help me," glowed Ruth. "I couldn't do a thing without the fairy godfather!"

There was something else—something that sent a flood of becoming rose color over her face; she was glad that, because of the gathering dusk, Mr. Gary couldn't see it.

"After tea, when you are quite comfortable, and I have my knitting, and Ellen Hawtree has gone to bed, we'll talk about something else, maybe," she decided, and Mr. Gary laughed, agreeing that perhaps it were better till the inner man was fortified, if the request was more astounding than the others, which was saying a good deal.

Notes of Christian Work

THE lepers at Bethesda Mission, Surinam, Dutch Guiana, we learn by a letter received from the Director, are threatened with starvation. The patients as well as the twenty-two children in care of the Mission not only suffer through lack of food, but the hospital management has no money with which to buy the cure, "arouni oil," which comes from India. What little funds are available are more urgently needed for food than for medicines. Miss Anna E. Scott, American Secretary of the Bethesda Mission, writes asking the co-operation of readers of the Christian Herald, "who have always responded to the call for help in past years." Any contributions for the work of the Bethesda Mission may be sent to the Christian Herald and will be promptly forwarded.

The Abigail Free School and Kindergarten, at 15 Charles St., New York, founded many years ago, is now one of the philanthropies of the big cities. It is supported by voluntary contributions. Last year it furnished 17,330 meals to little kindergarten pupils of from three to six years old. Friends of the Abigail last year raised a special fund which will be employed to purchase a suitable and permanent Home for the work, which continues under the efficient management of Mrs. E. W. Devare, widow of the founder.

The Church and Social Unrest

CIVILIZATION is undergoing a process of fermentation. This fermentation is seen in the social unrest of today. A list of the countries affected reads like a roster of all civilized nations. A state of mind so widely diffused and carrying with it such potentialities, either for the destruction of law and order or the creation of a new and better civilization, is of tremendous interest to the Christian world. The question the Church has to face is what attitude shall she take towards this unrest.

What Attitude Is to Be Taken Regarding Today's Problems

There are four possible attitudes open to her.

First, she may advocate repression and seek to establish a static condition in society. The Church has been and always will be a conservative institution. In spite of the criticism this arouses, it is in some ways a good thing. It makes her a shock absorber that prevents the organized life of mankind from being broken to pieces by constant jolts and jars, due to experimenting with immature plans of half-baked reformers. Reformers and radicals are not conspicuous for the care with which they mature their plans. They see a wrong and they seek to right it. Sometimes their efforts at righting one wrong lead to the introduction of others.

The Church may take a conservative attitude and strive to sterilize and hermetically seal the social order. She may seek to retain the present economic and civic life just as it is and teach that all change is bad. The voice of the pulpit may join with the power of the press and organized government for this purpose. For a time this effort may appear to succeed.

But, fermentation is a sign of life and it can be repressed for only a short time. In time it will break forth in some catastrophe that will wreck civilization and carry suffering to many innocent people. Even if the spirit that is causing the present fermentation could be sterilized and hermetically sealed in an iron-bound social order, it would be a terrible thing to do. Repression means stagnation and stagnation is the ruination of civilization. Life and hope would be warped or crushed. Routine drudgery would take the place of constructive thought, and a stereotyped life would force its stamp on all aspirations of the soul.

Christ knew the dynamic power of social and spiritual fermentation, and He told His disciples that the new wine of progress could not be placed in old skins, as the skins would burst under the strain and all would be lost. This is what the conservative attitude advocates and it is bound to fail.

THE second attitude the Church may take is that of speeding up the process of fermentation in society. There are a few people, more vociferous than thoughtful, who advocate this action. This type of mind thinks that the laboring man is always right because he is a laboring man, and the capitalist is always wrong because he has money. Those who hold this point of view believe that the Church should always co-operate with labor unions and endorse every radical theory of reformation that they advance. Fortunately, this type of mind is confined to only a few people whose enthusiasm is more commendable than their judgment. The main difficulty with this position is that it advocated the Church taking partizan action without the discrimination of sound judgment.

The third attitude the Church may take is that of a laissez-faire position toward the whole question. Some of those who advocate this laissez-faire attitude believe that the church is a spiritual institution and her only task is to develop the spiritual life of individuals. A study of the Gospels contradicts this contention.

Others say that ministers are so busy with the organization of their churches and their theological studies that they have no time to study these complex questions. That is like saying a man is so busy writing a book on ethics that he has no time to put out a fire that has started in his home. He must stop writing until he has put out the fire, or he will have to stop because the fire will put him out. Every educated man must take time to understand the social and economic questions that are sweeping the world, or he will be swept away by them.

Still others claim that the Church must not deal with questions so fraught with passion, because she is bound to stir up criticism and enmity. If fighting wrong stirs up enmity, may God forgive us if we ever advocate pacifism. This is the kind of criticism Christ had all His life, and He told His disciples that they had to expect it. It gave the Master no mercy in the Judgment Hall of Pilate or on the Cross of Calvary and it will give His disciples no mercy now. This is no reason for keeping out of the fight, but an added reason to start fighting at once and to keep on fighting as long as there is strength to deliver one more blow for righteousness.

Others who advocate this attitude of laissez-faire say that it is useless to enter this struggle, as society is in the process of evolution, and the trials and sufferings of today are but the birththroes of tomorrow. They are like men refusing to fight a forest fire because after the fire a new forest will grow up. This argument is theoretically true, but really fallacious. It does not consider the loss of the present timber or the long years of waiting before the new trees reach their maturity. This argument gives no heed to the loss of property and human suffering that follows every unwise effort in the line of social reconstruction.

THERE is only one other attitude possible for the Church to take. She must recognize that social fermentation is a reasonable process as long as it is properly directed and wisely controlled. She should seek to be the moulder and director of the spirit that is causing the fermentation. This is no easy task to be lightly spoken of and thoughtlessly undertaken. It means the placing of new wine into new wine skins and requires the creation of social, economic, and civic customs that will be adequate containers for the aspirations of a vigorous and newly awakened conscience. These containers have to be developed with care and it is impossible to decide by any process of a priori reasoning what they will be. We must put in operation the same methods used in scientific laboratories. We must experiment with many things until the right one is found. Investigation and the exchange of thought are essential steps to any sound conclusions, and should therefore be encouraged.

To meet this obligation, the Church must broaden her activities until she comes into close and compelling relationships with the whole life of society. This takes the Church out of stone cathedrals and away from quiet prayer meetings. It takes her into the markets and highways of life. She can no longer confine herself to creeds and catechisms, but she must stand on an open forum and attend the meetings of labor unions. It is well for her as she faces this new and larger responsibility to be mindful to keep her consecrated buildings and her quiet prayer meetings in good repair as she will need, at times, to get away from these vexing problems and seek the comfort and strength that come from divine guidance.

The sacred associations that spring from stained glass windows and the deep-voiced strains of a mighty organ are needed now as never before. They are the things that strengthen the soul to meet the stress and strain of toiling in dusty streets and entering into the treadmill of labor in a fearless effort to solve the ethical problems involved in the production and distribution of the necessities and comforts of life.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent. and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co. 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 15.

United States Rubber Co. 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6½ per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107½ per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent. are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7½ per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co. 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $200, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Record of Investments Chart—a simple chart for listing your securities which shows at a glance your monthly and annual income, together with necessary information on Federal Taxes—Ask for Circular 39.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12½%—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 42.

Barnsdall Corporation, 7 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold bonds to yield about 9 per cent. own and operate properties in 14 States. Total net assets 377 per cent. of this issue. Circular 40.

Circular 41 gives full information concerning a 7 per cent First and Refunding Mortgage Bond yielding about 8 per cent. 1920 earnings amounted to more than twice the annual interest charges on all underlying bonds including this issue.

How to Reduce

Your Weight

YOU CAN do it in a dignified, simple way in the privacy of your room and surprise your family and friends.

I know you can, because I've reduced 45,000 women from 20 to 85 lbs., and what I have done for so many I can do for you.

Don't reduce by drugs or diet alone. You'll look old if you do. You should have work adapted to your condition.

No woman need carry one pound of excess fat. It's so simple to weigh what you should, and you enjoy the process. My cheerful letters and your scales keep you enthusiastic. I build your vitality, strengthen your heart and teach you how to stand, walk and breathe correctly, as I reduce you.

If you send me your height and weight, I'll tell you just what you should weigh. No charge—and I'll send you an illustrated booklet FREE, showing you how to stand correctly. Write me! I will respect your confidence.

Young People's Topics for May 29

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Life-Sketches of Great Adventurers

B. Y. P. U., Matt. 4: 23-25; 5: 1-12.
Conquest Meeting

LITTLE seven-year old Catherine Mabie took home a Sunday-school paper and her aunt read to her the story of Mabita, a little African girl who was stolen by the slave-traders and made to walk many weary miles—hungry, footsore, afraid—to the seacoast, where she was sold into captivity. As Catherine listened to the reading of the story, she asked, "Why didn't Mabita tell Jesus about her troubles?" "Mabita doesn't know about Jesus," her aunt replied, "in all her country they have not heard about Jesus." It was the first time the child had heard there were other children in the world who had never heard about Jesus, to Whom she always told her childish troubles, and she decided then that she would go over, as soon as she was big enough, and tell Mabita about Him. Came the day when she graduated from Hahnemann College, Chicago, and soon after receiving her degree went to Africa. There she is today, healing, preaching, teaching, loving benighted humanity. She is but one of scores who are living the life sacrificial and heroic, thinking little of self and much of others, going about doing good.

There is no reading matter so inspiring as the biography of missionaries and the miracles of modern missionary endeavor. The latest novel, movie, drama may have their thrills, but "truth is stranger than fiction." The truth of God has produced more heroism than all other things combined. For material concerning Doctor Mabie read "Ministers of Mercy," by J. H. Franklin, and "Our Work on the Congo," by Catherine O. Mabie. For one of the best books on adventure that is free from the artificial and glittering unnatural, read "Ann of Ava," by Ethel D. Hubbard, and "Judson the Pioneer," by J. M. Hull. You can get these books from any publisher.

Union Meeting

E. L. and Junior League. (Joint meeting of the Juniors and Seniors)

THIS meeting will afford an excellent opportunity for the older members to inspire the younger members in League polity and ideals. There is an "Apostolic Succession" in the League and the day is coming when the younger members shall take the place of the older, the latter having passed on into the official relations of the Church. Let us make this union meeting one of education, information and inspiration.

Jews on the Farms

THE Jewish people seldom are considered as agriculturists in the United States, but the last annual report of the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society shows an estimated Jewish farm population of 50,000, tilling more than 1,000,000 acres. Beginning its work more than twenty years ago with about 200 Jewish families on farms in this country, the Society has done all in its power to stimulate a wholesome "back-to-the-soil" movement and has assisted many Jewish families to find farm homes instead of locating in the cities. It maintains a farm settlement bureau which helps applicants in the selection of suitable farms, and during the last year farms were found for 171 of the 1736 who registered for advice and guidance. The Society also conducts other departments to give scientific instruction in farming, to promote better sanitary conditions, to supply labor and to offer financial assistance to those who seek places on the land.

You can have a clear healthy complexion

UNSIGHTLY SKIN AFFECTIONS ARE CAUSED BY INTERNAL DISTURBANCES.

YEAST REMOVES THESE CAUSES

YOU often wonder why some girls have lovely skin. And haven't you lately met more girls whose faces glowed with a clear, natural pink color? But did you learn why?

The truth about clear skin

Science has rejected external treatment for skin troubles. Medical authorities now agree that a clear, beautiful skin is the result of vigorous bodily health.

You, like many others, can have that winning, natural color in your cheeks that comes from the glowing good health that the use of Yeast Foam gives.

The real cause of skin eruptions

New knowledge about food and nutrition has revealed that the cause of the annoying skin affections, boils and acne, commonly known as pimples, is often traced to a diet containing insufficient vitamins, that essential substance occurring in some foods, which nourishes and builds up the body.

Many relieved of skin troubles

The same cake you've known so long as Yeast Foam, is one of the richest known sources of the healthful vitamins that act upon the cause of pimples, blotchy skin and sallow complexions. Composed of countless marvelous little plants of vegetable nature, Yeast Foam furnishes vital elements often lacking in the improperly balanced diet—the principal cause of stomach disorders that result in so many ruined complexions.

The most obstinate cases of pimples, boils and other skin troubles have been relieved or cured by three cakes of Yeast Foam a day for from three to six weeks.

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals

Many eat the yeast cake plain, washing it down with a little water or milk. You'll soon like the taste. Some prefer to take a bite of yeast cake and a bite of cracker.

It's the same Yeast Foam you know so well as a bread raiser. Begin eating a cake or two a day while awaiting more interesting information which we shall be glad to send free.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

AMONG the leading topics suggested for prayer are world peace and international reconciliation, the readjustment of business in order that it may seek its normal channels and make the problem of living less hard, and for a special blessing on revival efforts in many parts of the country.

C. L. E., Brookwood, Ala., writes: "I want to join your Prayer League, for I am an ardent believer in earnest prayer. I want the League to pray for our revival to be held here in this town. Ours is a mining town, torn asunder by industrial strife. Oh, how we need an old-time Holy Ghost revival to save and reclaim!"

Mrs. C. O. H., Nampa, Ida., acknowledges answered prayer and adds: "We are trying to organize a Sunday school in this little country community, as there are so many children without Christian training. Kindly pray for a good revival here and that we may be able to organize."

Several members from New Pine Creek, Oregon, send this request: "Pray for northern California and southern Oregon that we may receive an outpouring of the Holy Spirit so that all Christians will become soul-winners. Pray, also, that the attendance at our prayer meetings may increase and that our unconverted relatives may become converted."

A Believer, Evanston, Ill., writes: "Pray for a religious revival in all schools and colleges of the nation and of all the world. We can not ask too much of our all-powerful and merciful Heavenly Father."

S. G., Sherwood, Tenn., asks special prayers and writes: "Pray that we may have a church house here in this place to worship God. I go from house to house and hold prayer meetings, but God has laid it upon me to build a church here. And I would ask your prayers, in Jesus' name."

M. E. C., Ames, Iowa, asks the prayers of the members in behalf of a revival at Blandon's Hill, Ill.; and Reader, China, Calif., asks that we remember the missionaries in Africa in those sections where the natives are untamed.

Rev. J. M. T., Creedmoor, N. C., writes: "I am asking the prayers of the League upon my home and also for the congregations over which the Holy Spirit has made me the overseer."

Miss O. W., Goodview, Va., writes: "I am principal of a graded school and have thirty-four pupils enrolled in my room, only three of whom profess Christ. A series of meetings will begin near my school very shortly. Please bear these thirty-one souls to the Throne of Grace, praying for their conversion."

A reader in New York asks the members of the League to pray earnestly for a sister who is suffering from a malignant disease, which is past the stage of surgery and can only be cured through prayer.

Two members ask special prayers in behalf of friends who are suffering from cancer—that their sufferings may be relieved and their faith strengthened.

A Friend writes: "Please remember Mrs. Pauline R. Atchison, one of the Christian Herald family, for nearly thirty years a beloved teacher in the public schools of Colorado Springs. She has been paralyzed on her right side since 1915."

"Pray that the Lord will greatly bless the Baptist Church of Florence, South Dakota, with a spiritual revival," writes C. R. McL., "and also give the pastor wisdom and spiritual strength to lead the people in the way of truth and righteousness."

Among the general requests are: 173 for healing; guidance, 20; wisdom, 21; reunion, 5; conversion of relatives and friends, 98; forgiveness, 23; courage, 9; success, 5; spiritual advancement, 15; heart's desire, 21; financial aid, 11.

We have also received acknowledgments of answered prayers from the following: Miss J. B., A. G. McN., G. W. B., M. S. C., Mrs. M. F. C., Mrs. S. S. P., J. C. N., Mrs. E. C. E.

The World News of the Week

rejected Senator Borah's plan for a disarmament conference of the United States, Great Britain and Japan and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs has decided informally to forget the disarmament resolutions referred to it.

President Harding, in explaining his position, made it plain that he was in complete sympathy with the cause of disarmament, but expressed the views that the issuance of a call for such a conference was purely an executive function and that he should not be embarrassed by Congressional action until international conditions are such as to give greater promise of success than at present. The German reparations controversy and the dispute over Yap were cited as unsettled questions which made such a call untimely now.

Senators Borah and Pomerene did not agree with the President and were preparing for a bitter fight for disarmament when the Naval Appropriations bill comes up in the Senate. The Senate Committee added $100,500,000 to the total of the bill as passed by the House, providing funds for the continuation of the 1916 program and for a personnel 20,000 in excess of the 100,000 proposed by the House. The measure was to be taken up immediately after disposal of the Emergency Tariff bill.

The Senate passed the bill to restrict immigration to 3 per cent. of the persons of various nationalities in the United States in 1910, and it was sent to conference because of one or two minor changes from the House draft. The vote was 78 to 1, Senator Reed being the only opponent. An effort was made to permit the entry of persons who could prove to the American authorities that they were the victims of political or religious persecution, but this proposal was rejected 60 to 15. The measure is designed to cut down the number of immigrants from southern and eastern Europe.

The bill creating a bureau of the budget and a general accounting office for the executive departments was passed by the House by a vote of 344 to 9 after two days' debate. A few changes were made in the measure as passed by the Senate, one of them permitting the removal by Congress of the Controller General, the chief accounting officer, without the approval of the President. It was expected the differences would be adjusted quickly in conference and that the President would sign the bill so that it would become effective at the opening of the new fiscal year, July 1.

Many Killed in Palestine Riots

FATAL clashes between the Jews and Moslems have occurred in Jaffa, Palestine, on a scale so extensive that martial law has been proclaimed and additional British troops hurried to the city. A British warship also was sent to the port. Sir Herbert Samuel, the British High Commissioner, announced that thirty Jews and ten Arabs had been killed and 227 wounded; while despatches to the French Foreign Office placed the number of dead at more than seventy with the fighting still in progress.

Bolshevik agents among the Jews emigrating from Russia were blamed for the disturbances. One account traced the inception of the fighting to a May-day Bolshevik demonstration led by Russian Zionists which aroused the resentment of the natives, both Christian and Moslem. A free-for-all fight took place and the parade was broken up, after which there was a general looting of the Jewish shops in the city, while the British troops, greatly outnumbered, were unable to restore order. Another account attributed the initial clashes to Jewish Communist interference with a labor meeting.

The fighting was renewed on succeeding days and the authorities found it necessary to make scores of arrests to quell the combatants. There were disturbances in other places in Palestine as the result of bitter feeling between the Moslems and Jews, but nowhere did they approach the magnitude of the Jaffa riots.

SENATOR NEWBERRY WINS APPEAL. The conviction of Senator Truman H. Newberry of Michigan of conspiracy to violate the Federal corrupt practices act during the senatorial campaign of 1918 has been reversed by the United States Supreme Court, which held that Congress did not have authority to regulate primaries and therefore could not fix the maximum sum which a candidate might spend in pre-election contests. Sixteen co-defendants were affected by the decision in favor of the Senator, who had been fined $10,000 and sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

HUGHES ORDERS PANAMA TO ACCEPT AWARD. Secretary Hughes has sent to the Republic of Panama a note announcing that unless Panama takes steps promptly, in an orderly manner, for the settlement of the Panama-Costa Rican boundary dispute in strict accordance with the White and Loubet awards the United States Government will take such steps as are necessary to give effect to the physical establishment of the boundary line under the decision of the arbitrators.

STEEL CORPORATION CUTS WAGES. Following reductions in the prices of its products, the United States Steel Corporation has announced a 20 per cent. cut in the wages of its day labor, and an intention to adjust other rates, including salaries. The saving was estimated at $58,000,000 a year and affects from 125,000 to 150,000 men.

$3,500,000 CHURCH BUILDING PLANNED. Plans have been announced for the erection in the heart of Chicago's business district of a sixteen-story building to cost $3,500,000, to house all national offices of the Methodist church.

LEAGUE ASSEMBLY SUMMONED. The Brazilian Ambassador at Paris, who is acting president of the Council of the League of Nations, has summoned the governments belonging to the League to send delegates to the second session of the League, which will open on September 5 at Geneva.

NINETY MOROS KILLED IN BATTLE. Ninety Moros were killed by a detachment of the Filipino constabulary in a battle on the Island of Sulu which followed the murder of a lieutenant and three other members of the constabulary. Only three of the Moro band, led by a religious fanatic, escaped.

JAPANESE CROWN PRINCE VISITS ENGLAND. Elaborate entertainments were given in England in honor of the Japanese Crown Prince, who arrived on board the battleship Katori. Later he was to visit France.

BISHOP HARRIS DIES. Bishop Marri-man Colbert Harris died at Aoyama College, a Methodist institution in Tokyo, at the age of seventy-five. He was elected bishop of Japan and Korea in 1904 and retired in 1916.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

MRS. R. W., Allamont, N. Y., sends this request: "In your Mail-Bag, please explain Matt. 19:28 and Matt. 20:23. One of our Sunday-school teachers said she would like to have them explained."

1. In dealing with the passage in Matt. 19:28, commentators accept it as a special promise to the disciples. The words "in the regeneration," are regarded as applying to those who had followed Jesus "in the New Kingdom or economy which He was then erecting—the new life now begun." Another interpretation is that those who had forsaken all and followed Him so faithfully, would have appropriate recognition; as the Kingdom of the Gospel advanced, the disciples would, by their influence, their spiritual knowledge and example, be chosen as the guides of all believers—a sense in which the promise can be regarded as already "illustriously fulfilled." The great majority of authorities, however, hold that the promise refers to the future glory. (See Luke 22:28-30). 2. The passage in Matt. 20:23, deals with the special request by the mother of Zebedee's children for her two sons (the one to sit on the right hand of Christ, and the other on the left, in the Kingdom) and the Saviour's answer was a rebuke rather than a denial. The places would be given to those for whom they were prepared. The principle of distribution was not based on favor, but on faithful, loving service. Some of the disciples may have cherished ambitious dreams of a worldly kingdom, in which they might have illustrious seats. It was this spirit which Jesus meant to rebuke (see Mark 10:35-41).

Interested Reader, Davenport, Ia. Intoxicating drink in various forms, is a vice almost as old as the human race. Doubtless there were drunken roysterers before the Flood. Recent archeological research has revealed the fact that the ancient Egyptians brewed several kinds of liquor, all intoxicating, it is believed. Scholarly investigators are of the opinion that it will yet be shown that this was one of the main causes of that once great empire's downfall, as it was in Greece many centuries afterward.

A. P., Markle, Ind. The passage in the last chapter of Solomon's Song, verse 5, is held by some Bible students to refer to Christ and his bride, the Church, the reference to the apple tree being regarded as symbolic of the fall in Eden, etc. There is, however, no ground for any interpretation such as your letter mentions. There are many reverent scholars today who take a different view, and who rather regard the entire eight chapters as an Oriental epithalamium or wedding song, and as having no special relation to spiritual affairs.

F. F. H., Hagerstown, Md., writes: "In your reply to J. T. S. I note the same problem that we had to deal with recently. The answer that seemed quite satisfactory I never saw in any comment on John 21:25, and I now submit it to you for your judgment. John 21:25 was interpreted in the light of John 1:3, 'without Him was not anything made that was made.' When we consider the vast universe, of which this world is a mere atom, we may realize that we could as easily put all literature on a postage stamp as the whole record of infinite creation on or in this tiny atom of a world. In the light of that, we accept the statement, not as a figure of speech but as the literal statement of a fact, which the one that uttered scarcely comprehended, or he apparently modified the urge of the Spirit by his own 'suppose.'"

Mrs. Lydia R. Ordway, Colo., writes: "I have just read 'Sermonettes for Children,' in the March 5 number and I should like to ask where the children go after such a sermon? I do not think children are hurt by a little enforced quiet at church, once or twice a week. The less time they spend in God's house in youth, the less they are likely to spend there when they are grown up. Among my acquaintance, the children who were always in their places at church and Sabbath school are the ones who are the most faithful in their attendance now. I have heard the excuse that such a one was 'made to attend church when young, and now they won't go,' but from my observation the children who went when they pleased and stayed at home when they wanted to, are not the faithful ones in later life."

J. C. V., Bogota, N. J., writes: "Henry Ward Beecher was asked by a young lady member of his church if it was right for a Christian to dance. His answer was: 'I never saw a Christian that desired to dance. John the Baptist lost his head through the dancing of Herodias's daughter.'"

25,000 Words Frequently Mispronounced

There are 25,000 Chances for You to Make Yourself Ludicrous in the Pronunciation of English Words

And yet the man or woman of good breeding cannot afford to take a single one of them.

You should be familiar with the proper pronunciation of these 25,000 tricky words and be ever on your guard against misusing them.

Speech occupies so important a place in the society, business and professional life of our day that its intensive study is practically becoming the hobby of all intelligent citizens.

Slipshod and incorrect pronunciation is taken as a sure sign of careless and indifferent breeding.

A Blunt Mispronunciation of One Important Word May—

Spoil the charm of your conversation—Ruin a good speech—Make a lecture ludicrous—Destroy the power of a sermon—Discount a sales talk—Lessen the prestige of a teacher, and invite derision and discomfiture.

Your train of thought may be valuable and interesting—your grammar may be correct—your appearance faultless—but you destroy the effect of all these if your spoken English is shabby and imperfect.

You may avoid all this by obtaining the new volume.

A Desk Book of 25,000 WORDS Frequently Mispronounced

Compiled by F. H. Vizetelly, Litt. D., LL. D., Managing Editor of The New Standard Dictionary; author of "A Desk Book of Errors in English," etc.

The Missions and Mexico's Redemption

How Protestant Workers Can Help the Nation to Solve Its Problems, Political as Well as Social

By WALLACE THOMPSON

THE work of the mission schools in Mexico has been devoted to the creation of a growing company of educated, devoted Christian leaders which shall ultimately reach into every Mexican community, and there shall slowly uplift the inhabitants. The one need of that unhappy land has been for such leaders, a need which so long ago as the beginning of the Diaz régime, in 1876, was appreciated and fomented by the great dictator himself. But Diaz's leaders were only the political henchmen of his time, mixed-blood town officials who alone spoke Spanish in Indian villages, and jefes políticos or heads of counties sent out by the central government to distant centers of population. Some of them were excellent and worthy men, and others, many others, used their power and their knowledge to exploit their charges.

The ideal was good, as so many of the ideals of Mexican government are good, but in practice there was failure, and limitations lay heavy on its sponsors. The work of the Protestant mission schools has, on the other hand, been a working toward the realization of a dream as great, almost, as Christendom itself. They have planned, and have sought, with a widening power, to train up preachers and teachers and evangelists who might go into these same villages, and there live with the narrow-minded natives, truly raising them by their own example and teaching.

And the greatest of those leaders, today, are to my mind those very missionaries, foreigners as they are, but devoted as few Mexicans can be devoted, to the simple hope of the welfare of the people. These missionaries have their defects, perhaps, but in the mass and in the vast majority of the individuals, they are worthy of all the faith and hope that has been put in them.

IN THE City of Monterey, in Northern Mexico, I met, not so many months ago, an American missionary whom I had known ten years before in Mexico City. He was gray and a bit stooped, where when I knew him his hair was black and his nervous carriage brisk and strong. The years of anxiety and difficulty had told on him. Yet there he was, in Mexico still, as he had been through all the years of my own time in Mexico City, and all the ten years since. He talked of Mexico, of the government, of the mission, of the mission schools, and of the work, not long before, of distributing American corn to save the poor of Monterey from starvation, corn given by our Red Cross, but taxed mercilessly in imports and freight by the Carranza government. This man—and he is the typical American missionary in Mexico—is not a Hoover, he is not a Beecher, nor yet a Father Damien. A plain man, with faults and weaknesses. But withal an American, a clergyman, and one who knows Mexico as a few foreigners ever know it.

It is this type of man who has tilled the field in Mexico—the list of those in the work today includes nearly half of those who were there before 1910, long before 1910. Some of those others have been misfits, some have gone elsewhere to greater work, but these have hung on as deeply devoted workers or perhaps as just men "holding a job." It does not matter which, for human nature is as it is. But this does matter, that these men know Mexico; they are of Mexico. They have woven themselves into her life and have marked many thousands of Mexicans as their disciples and their friends.

It is in the field of education that the missionaries have done most—for there are but few workers in the churches but have had a part in the mission schools. The mission schools, far more than the churches, were, however, affected by the anti-religious upheaval under Carranza in 1915-18. The decrees were aimed, we were told, at the Catholics, and provided for the nationalization of church real estate—all church buildings were supposed to become the property of the Mexican Republic, to be loaned, if the government saw fit, to church organizations. The decrees also provided that no foreigner should conduct religious services in Mexico—a blow at the Spanish and Italian priests and bishops. These two provisions the Protestants were encouraged to ignore, and there is no record of the taking of any Protestant Church property or the stopping of any service conducted by a foreign missionary. The mission properties remained in Protestant hands (sometimes transferred to individuals) and the services continued—there was a very well accepted understanding that in this "violation of law" the Protestants would not be molested. It all gave occasion for criticism of the Protestants, but it brought little immediate or ultimate harm to their work.

THE mission schools were, however, slightly affected. The law was most definite regarding the closing of religious schools, and the Protestants were forced to close many, and to limit religious teaching in others. There was no very long period of cessation, however, and long before the Catholic clergy returned (as they did in 1918-19), the mission schools had resumed their work, practically where it has been left off a few months before. In the years before the Carranza visitation, there had been an intensive development of education in certain missionary centers. In the Capital there were seminaries, normal schools, and many primary schools (taught by Mexican women and men). Monterey had model schools, Puebla was soundly placed, Chihuahua, Guadalajara, Hermosillo, Victoria—the list grows as one's mind's eye sketches the country. Today practically all of these are again in operation, only the change in the plan of mission work has consolidated some of them and established new ones in other stations over the country.

There have always been many schools for girls—the mission societies of the United States have a heart interest in the work amongst the women—and hundreds of teachers have been trained there, teachers for the mission primary schools, and teachers for the public schools. Always there have been government places (though the salary is sometimes even smaller than the missions give) for all the teachers the mission schools could furnish, and an astonishing number of the women thus trained have gone on with their careers, married or single though they have been.

I like to think of that devotion to the ideals of service which the American men and women drilled into their Mexicans. The devotion of the mission schools to this ideal of service and of leadership has been continuous and growing. But it has, until now, been confined with few exceptions to the education of teachers, and to the furnishing of leaders who have worked largely through the profession of teaching. That has sometimes led them into other activities, but primarily they have been teachers and, of course, ministers.

THOSE who know Mexico know that while education and uplift of the mind are the great needs of the people, the road to those minds must be through the more tangible ways of hand and indeed of heart. The latter way, through religious teaching, is being nobly carried on by the mission churches, but the training of the hand is as yet only in its beginnings.

Mission schools offer a chance to ragged, forlorn urchins such as this

But those beginnings are made, and they have today a broad foundation on which to build. The first great phase was the organization five years ago, of a comprehensive plan of co-operation in missions and in schools between some dozen Protestant missionary organizations operating in Mexico. This co-operative agreement is one of the most significant experiments in the whole history of foreign missions. It has apparently already eliminated entirely all basis for friction. It has, moreover, made possible the broadest covering of the whole field of possibilities in the country, in contrast with the previous condition, when many churches concentrated in certain points, leaving vast stretches of Mexico absolutely without workers.

At a conference held in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1914, this co-operation plan was discussed by a large company of missionaries and others, most of whom had been driven out of Mexico by the events of the revolution and by the orders from the American State Department following the occupation of Vera Cruz by American troops.

With two exceptions (the Southern Baptists and the Episcopalians) all the Protestant churches working in Mexico agreed to a zoning system by which the too-intensive development of a few fields like Mexico City and Monterey should be done away with, and the churches assigned widely over the country, inaugurating far broader and more generous work.

In this rearrangement, a remarkable spirit of co-operation developed. With little controversy, the churches to which old fields were assigned took over the properties of others who had been there, terms of settlement being easily arranged. The friendly spirit went further toward true Christian co-operation than mission work has ever gone in any other field, for ministers were reassigned and took up work under churches other than their own without being re-ordained and in complete co-operation.

One effect of this important improvement has been the reorganization of the education program, and a vast broadening of the plan and the horizon of the schools. Already the central Mexican university is planned, and, working out from it, many preparatory and normal schools, and, best of all, technical and vocational schools of the finest type, agricultural and mechanical in all their branches. Some of them are already under way, to a limited extent, and the whole scheme of training leaders in industry as well as in schools is being developed. The idea of Hampton Institute, the great training-post of negro leaders in this country, of giving each student a trade in which he is an expert, should, when adapted to Mexican conditions, do miracles industrially and educationally.

AND here enters in the great force which must be used, and with which the American missions must join hands, if both are to have their greatest development. I refer to the American industrial concerns in Mexico. Back of some of these is already a record of fine work.

Perhaps the most outstanding example of the educational achievements of American corporations was that of the schools which were organized and operated by the National Railways of Mexico between 1890 and 1912, under the direction of E. N. Brown, then president of the National Railways—one of the "pernicious foreigners" who were exiled under Carranza's "nationalization" of the railways. These railway schools trained between 15,000 and 18,000 Mexican mechanics and engineers, taking boys of 14 and 15, paying them first 62 cents a day and gradually increasing this until, after four years' work, they were receiving three and a half pesos a day. They were then ready to take positions as skilled workers on the railways lines or, if they chose, in other industries—the railway placed no limitation upon them, holding that all benefited in the increase in the efficiency of the Mexican worker wherever he might be.

The whole scheme of the work, including the plan of paying the apprentices while learning, was the broadest type of educational service, taken up, to be sure, because the railways needed skilled mechanics and trainmen, but with an effect on Mexico and on the creation of the so-called "middle class" which is still felt through the chaos of revolutionary destruction.

The railways are now being operated by the Mexican Government, and the schools have long since been abandoned. The railway executives are now political favorites and not trained railway men, but the personnel is still fairly well led by the men trained under American tutelage. The railways do still run, even if they do little else.

Today the great industry of Mexico is the production and refining of petroleum, and foreign companies, of course, control it. Much genuinely helpful welfare work is being done by them, and the very conscious plan of increasing wages until unskilled labor now receives a minimum of $2 a day is having a remarkable effect on the standard of living of the Mexicans of the

A typical Protestant congregation in the Methodist Church in Mexico City. These men and women are the hope of Mexico for the leaders, teachers and workers of the future

Tampico oil section. There is much undigested prosperity, and agitators are creating trouble as far as they can for the foreigners. On the whole, however, the effect on the material welfare of the peon has been advantageous, although again there is real need for education and for some form of religious restraint.

Education has been indeed taken up by some of the companies, and where separate villages have been built, as in the model Mexican town of Terminal, across the river from Tampico on the property of the Doheny companies, really excellent schools are maintained under American control.

Conditions in the oil country, outside of the private company towns, are deplorable, however, for the graft

and incompetence of the present ruling classes of Mexico have regarded prosperous oil towns only as the most luxurious of posts for influential favorites. The educational conditions in Tampico, where in a town of 100,000 there are only twenty government primary schools with an attendance of 4,500 pupils, beggars description. Where the foreign companies have been called upon to contribute to the cost of schools, to city improvements, or to the fighting of yellow fever epidemics, the money which they have given has been lost in the bottomless pit of Mexican graft.

THIS is the field wherein I believe that the co-operation of the missionaries and the companies will bring about a solution of the ultimate Mexican problem. For the companies, ready and anxious as I have found them to serve, would, through the missions, find a means wherein their money and the great force of their prestige would find efficient direction. The foreign oil, mining and railway companies will not hesitate, I believe, to put their resources and opportunities at the disposal of workers who they are convinced can truly improve the morale of the native workers upon whom their business depends. Heretofore there seems to have been mutual misunderstanding—the companies have not always been as appreciative as they might have been of the influence and direction which the missions could give them, and the missionaries have been quick on the trigger to find the companies representing predatory capital which has the sole ambition of putting down the "devoted leaders of the people" or of forcing American intervention.

I have faith in both the companies and the missionaries, and I believe that in the new political crisis which Mexico is bringing upon herself as this is written, (and which she may have tumbling about her ears before it is printed) these two must reach out, and will reach out, to clasp hands and go on together.

When that time comes, we may look for the completing as well as the broadening of the work of the missions in Mexico.

Today their work is limited, for a complete missionary plant includes churches, schools and doctors and hospitals, and for these last much money and much opportunity must be forthcoming. The Protestants have had evangelical work in Mexico for forty years, and schools for a generation. But there are almost no medical missionaries. The official lists of 1910 showed ten in all Mexico, and six of these were of one denomination, now, I believe, retired from the field. There are hospitals in Puebla, in Monterey and Mexico City. But these are not, actually, a part of the missionary scheme, only connected with it.

The work is a broad one, and the need of prestige and a great nation-wide plan is vital. Ignorance such as Mexico's will sometimes listen to tales of new gods, but long tradition fights against changes in the treatment of disease, and when death comes the "foreign devil" was a poisoner—I have met the same attitude on the Mexican trail when I have given quinine to a child who was dying of fever.

THERE is a great need for the medical missionary, with hospitals, dispensaries and classes, for Mexico is as sick a land as man has ever seen, with people so worth the saving, with children so worth the giving of health. Mexico has so much to give her sons if they but had the strength and will and faith to develop the things that are waiting for them. Should I be asked to tell what I would wish most for Mexico, even before I talked of education, almost before I talked of a human diet for the country, I should say health, and training in health and hygiene.

This work the missions must take up. I have shown, in the second article of this series, how by the very figures of the boasting Mexican government; there is twice as much sickness, twice as much severe illness in Mexico as in the United States. Those who know Mexico know that a really well Mexican is a rarity—there is always some trouble, usually with the stomach, to keep down his energy. And when one thinks how much mere teaching would do, how much medical missionaries could accomplish just by telling the Mexican women just how their babies should be fed, even with what their poverty affords! For although at the basis is that poverty, it is aggravated beyond all description by the utter, unbelievable ignorance of them all. The medical profession of Mexico is supposedly like ours, but their own higher type of doctors frankly describe its ignorance as utterly criminal, and the training in the National Medical School, even before the revolution, as the most flagrant of all the exhibitions of Mexican dilettantism.

Education of the hands, then, and education of the bodies, first and foremost, and then, woven through these two, the bettering of the conditions of the people through better wages, nobler work, broader vision in the planning of the national economic future.

For these the co-operation I have talked of is indispensable, and because it is indispensable, it will

The Older Boy and a Life Problem

I HAD an idea that after the Boy had faced the Problem of the Tobacco, and the Girl, and the Bible as taught by the scientific method, that he wouldn't trouble me for awhile. And that is right where I made another mistake. I ought not to have spoken of these problems as a "trouble," for I was beginning to find out that the Boy was passing through the same experience that I had when I was young; but like a good many fathers in this glorious republic, I was in danger of forgetting it, and treating his problems as troubles, instead of opportunities to get nearer to him.

And may I say right here—because I have had it intimated to me that no Boy in love with a giddy young Thing like the one his mother was so afraid of, would ever have done what I asked him to do—that both his mother and I decided afterwards that the Boy was not really very much in love. That was the reason that the tests I asked him to apply were possible. But that is an aside.

What the Boy brought to me a few weeks later was of a far different character, as you will see when I tell you about it. I don't think I am very good at narrative, so I will give you the conversation the Boy and I had over the matter one evening when we were alone. This time it was in his own room into which he invited me to come. That had not happened very often, so I took it as a compliment, which it really was.

"I don't want to keep troubling you with my problems all the time, Dad," he said, "but I wish you would tell me what I ought to do."

You may remember that I corrected the Boy once for calling me "Dad," but he used the term so naturally that I did not seem to find anything to criticize in it.

"What you ought to do?" I said. "You are not in—"

"No," he said coloring up a little. "Nothing to do with that. What I want is some advice about my life work."

"Oh!" I said, as if the Boy's having any life work was a strange idea for him to entertain. "Well—"

"You see, I graduate next June and I don't seem to know just what I ought to do."

NOW I had given this matter almost no thought, except to take for granted without ever having talked to the Boy about it, that he would go into the store and take up the business I was in.

"I supposed you would come into the store with me."

"No!" he said very positively. "I hate business!"

Well, do you know, that just about knocked me over. The idea of any one in the family hating the business that made us our bread and butter—especially butter, considering the market price—was an idea that I had never entertained. And at first I was inclined to say to the Boy, "What's good enough for your Dad is good enough for you!"

But on second thought, I began to think perhaps the Boy had a little right to choose what he would do in this world, so I waited.

"I'm sorry to disappoint you, Dad. But I just can't think of business. It doesn't appeal to me in the least."

"Well!" I replied, I am afraid a little sharply, "what do you want to do? Open a barber-shop?"

He stiffened up at that, and I was afraid the incident of his having a problem of doing something was going to be closed, so far as taking me into his confidence was concerned. But he choked down something, and turned such a wistful look on me, that I felt like kicking myself for a selfish old father.

"No," I said, "I didn't mean that. Tell me what other occupations or professions you don't like. Let's get at the matter by elimination. Tell me what else you hate or don't like and then perhaps we can find out what your likings are."

At that he brightened up.

"Well, out out politics."

I GULPED a little at that, for I am a good—never mind what party, as I don't want to create any prejudice against this series of articles. But I didn't say any thing.

"And I don't care for journalism or law."

"Same here. Specially the fellows that drew up the income-tax law," I said with some feeling.

"And I never had any leaning toward farming or architecture or engineering."

"Nor I," I said to encourage him, as he seemed to hesitate over the list of "eliminations."

"And I don't think I am fitted to teach in any special department. I am horribly afraid of showing my ignorance."

"I would be too," I murmured.

"And I don't care to open a barber-shop," he said with something like a grin.

"No. Cut that out. Shave it off the list."

"And I never cared for art or music. You know I can't carry a tune more than a yard without fainting away."

"Or causing others to do so," I replied, remembering the anguish of the family once when the Boy bought a cornet and practised on it in his room.

"Yes," the Boy smiled in his wistful way. "And I never wanted to be a painter."

"Yes, I remember. That time you balked over the proposal I made to you and the other boy that you paint the kitchen floor, and save a big bill."

"But I did paint it; after all," he said a little reproachfully.

"Well, I'm willing to help you. But I can't choose your life work. You will have to do that yourself. I don't mind saying I am disappointed that you don't want to come into the store. Your mother and I have almost taken it for granted that some time you would."

"I can't do it, Dad. I'd like to just to please you. But I feel as if I ought to do something else."

"I'm sorry. But you must decide it. I stand ready to help you in any way I can. Have you talked with your mother?"

"Not lately."

"She is very wise, your mother is," I said somewhat vaguely. And as the Boy seemed to be at an end of the interview I went away, somewhat disappointed over the way the thing ended. We had not settled anything, and I did not see any farther into the Boy's life work than he did, apparently.

IT WAS about a week after that unsatisfactory talk, that the college Y. M. C. A. started some special meetings, and a returned missionary from China was one of the speakers. It seems that he was retained by the Y. to stay for several days to hold conferences with the students about life-work problems.

Something of the character of the meetings drifted across the table at meal-times, but nothing very definite, and the Boy, I remembered afterwards, was more serious-looking than I had ever noticed him. But one evening, just after the close of these meetings, the Boy came into the library where I was reading, and as he sat down I couldn't help seeing the real look of resolve in his face. He is handsome, the Boy is, and I don't wonder that people like him and sometimes fall in love with him.

"Dad," he said coming to the point at once, as is the habit with the whole family, "I have decided to be a medical missionary."

You could have knocked me down with a pinfeather.

"A med—"

"Yes, a medical missionary to China. Medicine was one of the things we did not 'eliminate' when we went over the list. I have had a leaning towards medicine for some time. I like to help people in pain. I felt fascinated when last summer we went into the operating room at Augustana hospital and saw Dr. Ochsner do those wonderful things."

"Well," I said. "But you said 'medical missions.' That will mean going as a missionary."

"Yes," said the Boy, and his face fairly gleamed. "Dr. Stuart" (that was the name of the missionary from China who had been holding the conferences at the college) "was a wonderful man! The opportunities for service in China are simply tremendous. I feel as if I had a real call to go."

I MUST confess that at first I sat there bewildered. The idea that any one in our family would ever choose to be a missionary, even a medical one, had never entered my head. All my folks had always gone into business. I was still thinking it seemed queer, when the Boy's mother came down-stairs and joined us in the library.

I must have looked somewhat dazed, for the Boy's mother came up to me, and with a tear glistening in her eye, she said, as she leaned over and put her dear face on my cheek: "Yes, the Boy has told me. Isn't it grand to think that he has chosen to be a missionary? What a wonderful life he will have!"

"Yes," I said somewhat feebly, for I was still bewildered. "Wonderful!"

"I had to choose between the ministry and the movies, Dad. You don't feel disappointed, do you?"

"Disappointed! Well—" I put out my hand and the Boy put out his. I couldn't say anything more at the time, I was so upset. But after the Boy went upstairs to his room, my wife said, her face shining with a tender light I had seen on it only a few times. "I have been praying for this, a long, long time."

And now the whole family has a growing pride that we are to be represented over in China. I found myself saying to my junior partner the other day: "My Boy is going to help shape the future Republic of China. Great business!"

He stared at me as if I was a little "off." But I understand that is what medical missionaries have to be: Statesmen of the highest order. And the Boy said he had no use for politics!

Dr. Sheldon Discusses

The Common Task

1. Be thankful if you have one, and are well enough to work at it.
2. It is better to earn one's bread by the sweat of one's brow than try to make a living by making other folks sweat.
3. Some people don't enjoy the common daily task, because they stay up too late the night before.
4. It is the common work of the human hand that keeps us all from starving to death.
5. To do one's daily work honestly and faithfully, whether we ever get thanked for it or not, is every-day heroism.
6. Don't expect a medal just because you are working hard for small wages. There are not enough medals to go around.
7. The sum total of common tasks well done makes cities and states and republics worth-while.
8. If the common task makes you tired at the end of the day, thank God if you are able to sleep at night.
9. Jesus worked with His hands nearly all His life. I am in good company if I have to work for a living.

"Yes, I remember you did. And we couldn't walk over it for a week without sticking down to it, you put so much glue into it instead of turpentine," I said.

"We will eliminate painting," the Boy said, going on hastily. "And I don't like railroading or banking or the insurance business."

"Well," I said perhaps a little shortly, "is that all?"

"It's all I think of right now."

"Then I don't see that you have much of anything left to choose except the ministry or moving pictures."

AT THAT, the Boy looked at me so strangely that I felt rebuked at my levity.

"Of course," I said hastily. "The ministry is out of the question."

He didn't reply at once. Then he said:

"Or the movies."

"It's up to you," I said using a slang phrase I had more than once corrected him for.

"Yes, I guess it is. You can't help me, can you, Dad?"

CHAPTER X

SO, WHEN everything was favorable, Ruth, sitting where the glow of the shaded lamp would not fall upon her face, asked her lawyer if there was not some way by which a publisher of books might be persuaded to accept a book manuscript by an unknown author. For a considerable sum of money, of course.

"H'm," mused Mr. Gary, casting a sharp glance at the bowed head in the shadows, "why not?"

"Then do you suppose those big publishers in New York—naming the firm to which David Blair had sent his book—would do it?"

"I went to school with old Tom, the head of the firm," said Mr. Gary, reminiscently. "I don't know about them—they are mighty big people in their profession. What do you want me to do?"

"Oh, I am so glad you went to school with one of them! Dear Mr. Gary, could you, by any means, induce them to accept a book by David Blair? The man you met at my house-warming, you know. He—oh, I just can't tell you how much hinges on their acceptance of his book! It will kill his ambitions to have it sent back; it has been the dream of his life, and now that it is finished he is miserable, because he believes it a failure, though he didn't when he was writing it. If it is accepted, he—why, the world will just mean paradise for him! They have already had it a few weeks—could you telegraph them to hold it until you come, and maybe make some arrangement? Buy the manuscript outright—give them—oh, give them anything they want, anything! But be sure that it is so arranged that he will never, never find it out!"

"What does it mean to you, little Ruth, if the book is accepted?" asked Mr. Gary, quietly; and Ruth, her head bowed to his knee, whispered that it meant everything to her!

"Then, if old friendship can do it, I'll succeed. At least, I'll see that the book is carefully read," vowed Mr. Gary. Walking to the telephone, he called up long distance, was connected with the big publisher's own house in the city, and in a few minutes was talking to his old friend.

"Do you still hold a book manuscript by David Blair—don't know the title?" asked Mr. Gary, when the old friends had chatted a few moneyed minutes, "and if so, will you let me know—and hold it till I can come and see you about it?"

The big publisher, known to Mr. Gary as old Tom, having gotten into communication with his chief reader, replied later that there was a manuscript by David Blair still in the office safe, waiting for a verdict. It would be held; and he would be mighty glad to see his old friend, and beat him playing golf, too. Would meet him in his car at the station and take him out home. Just notify him by wire or phone.

RUTH breathed happily when these messages were delivered by Mr. Gary. "If he'll just take it, and print it," she murmured, "that will be enough. I am sure it will sell if properly advertised, and everything done that mere money can do. Be sure and—offer a big sum, dear Mr. Gary."

"Old Tom may order me out of his house, when he knows my errand," warned Mr. Gary; "but I'll do my best—for you."

"I don't know how much it will take, but if there is enough left I want, so badly, to endow a home for little orphan girls, and name it for my grandfather," Ruth said, with tears in her eyes, "just a few little girls, who can be clothed and taught and made comfortable. A hundred thousand dollars would be all I could ever spend, in a lifetime. Couldn't the rest be invested by you, who are so wise about business, so that they could have a home? Just a wee cottage, where they could be brought up by a good, motherly woman, and taught home economies by a good teacher, so they would be capable housekeepers. Could you—could I do this, dear Mr. Gary?"

Mr. Gary didn't know—he looked into the tender face, filled with the love of humanity, forgetful of herself, and a lump was in the old, worldly lawyer's throat, that had never been there since he was a boy. "If it is possible, we'll arrange it, honey," he said gently; "just a few girls, maybe we can. I'll see."

The next day the fairy godmother's wand was waved over the diminished head of Donaldson, when Tom proudly paid the mortgage, and Mr. Gary gave into the hands of the Scotchman the amount of his wages, and bade him leave instant.

She waved her wand over the head of Mary Smithers, who was radiant with joy, and who came flying over to see Ruth, telling her how her father, seeing Tom's money with his own eyes, had been very willing to exchange Donaldson for Tom, as a prospective son-in-law.

"Oh, ain't money wonderful, Miss Ruth, when folks use it right?" glowed Mary, "just to think how Tom is changed by it—looks like another man, he does. And—and he told me so much last night that—that a girl loves to hear from her sweetheart, Miss Ruth! Things he hadn't dared to say before, on account of not having any home to offer me. I told him I'd have been willing enough, but I couldn't speak out and say so, being a girl."

OVER the bowed head of poor little Miss Emily, sitting in her chilly little room by her chilly little stove, the godmother waved the magic wand of great wealth with superlative success.

Ruth did not accompany Mr. Gary on his visit to Miss Emily; she was afraid that, by something or some word, Miss Emily might become suspicious of the legacy. But she need not have feared.

"Simple as a child, that little woman is," declared Mr. Gary, "soon as I told her it was her Cousin David Ap David of Wales, she fell for it—believed implicitly in my tale. Ruth, I wish you could see her now. She's actually gracious, and puts on airs!"

"She'll be over, soon," laughed Ruth. "She'll get Mrs. Abner Green to fetch her in the buggy. I hope Mrs. Green will be as unsuspecting."

But Miss Emily was too ill to venture out; she sent post-haste for Ruth, one of her pupils being the messenger. Ruth found the little woman with eyes shining like stars, and her hands, the poor right one still bunched up in red flannel, fluttering wildly.

"I know all about your good news, Miss Emily," said Ruth, cheerily, "and you are to come and spend a while with me, till you get ready to go on that trip to Bermuda—for of course you'll go?"

"Thank you so much, my love," accepted Miss Emily, graciously. "I will enjoy the sojourn in your dear home almost as much as my trip to the Bermudas. Mrs. Abner Green's niece, Susie Lemon, will accompany me. Susie is one of my former pupils, and a dear girl, but anemic—a slight cough, h'm, you know?" Miss Emily nodded; "and it might develop into something serious. And I shall of course buy back the Old Home, which is owned by a man who is callous, and cannot appreciate it. When I come back, next spring, I shall rejuvenate it," said Miss Emily, grandly, "and my own room shall be a replica of yours, dear Ruth, if you don't object."

"I'll be honored," Ruth said, heartily, "and we shall soon get you ready for your trip, Miss Emily—Miss Susanna Baines and the rest of us. You shall have a warm coat and a tailored suit to travel in, and the rest will be summer things, think of it!"

"I ought to wear mourning for Cousin David Ap David," said Miss Emily, thoughtfully, "and I ought to write—but Mr. Gary has promised to get the address for me, if he has any living family."

"Oh, I wouldn't wear mourning, Miss Emily," urged Ruth, knowing that the feeble little soul needed all the comfort gay clothes could give, "you'll want white, and things like that. He—I'm sure your cousin wouldn't want any mourning worn for him, if he knew how delicate you were."

Miss Emily, who loathed black, was readily persuaded to give up the idea of mourning. "After all, it is the heart, dear," conceded the little woman, "and I shall always mourn the fact that—that I didn't much like Cousin David! He was a rather grumpy gentleman, afflicted with gout, and red in the face. But he had a warm heart, and he loved his family—we Welsh are clannish, my dear, very clannish! He must have been very, very old when he died," she added, thoughtfully. "He was an old man, as I recall."

MR. GARY, his duties satisfactorily discharged, took himself off on the train for New York next day. He would let Ruth know the success of his mission, she knew, as early as possible; there was nothing for her to do but wait as patiently as she could for the outcome of his visit to "Old Tom."

Meanwhile Miss Emily graciously consented to come and occupy the spare-room at Hideaway House until such time as Miss Baines and the neighbors could get her apparel ready, and Susie Lemon, still waking up every morning to wonder if she hadn't dreamed that she was going to Bermuda, could get her own things done.

Ruth was busy every minute; she made a trip to the nearest town where such things could be procured, taking Miss Emily, who tried on traveling suits and coats and hats, and was very delightfully flurried over it all. She helped Tom plan repairs and improvements on his own cottage, and gave all the spare time she could to Nancy Auld, who was now wheeled over every day or so, and was so happy that she could only look, with shining eyes, on the girl who was—even more than she dreamed—her comfort-bringer.

Miss Emily, because of Cousin David Ap David's decease—supposed to be recent—could not be entertained. Ruth, who would have dearly loved to give a joyous party to the little old lady by way of celebrating, was forced to feed her guest with all the dainties poor Miss Emily loved and had done without for many, many years. Chicken salad she had heard Miss Emily mention with awe, as being food for festivals in her young days. And pound cake, Miss Emily said, had always been served by her Aunt Hester and her own mother to their guests.

Determined that Miss Emily should be gratified, Ruth made chicken salad on every possible occasion, and baked pound cake till even Ellen Hawtree remarked that it was wasteful to cook such fine things for just Miss Emily. And how she did fatten! Daily one might see flesh increasing on the guest's small bones, and the rheumatism, in the delicious summer atmosphere of Ruth's house, left the little teacher comparatively free of its pangs.

MR. GARY, meanwhile, telephoned from New York that he had seen his old friend, who assured him that he would personally give the manuscript his attention—would read it himself, and if he found it worth-while, would consider its publication. Nothing more—Ruth must still wait, and every day seemed an age.

At last Miss Emily and Susie Lemon were ready, their clothes packed in their new trunks—Miss Emily had given Susie a steamer trunk which was the duplicate of her own; going away on a steamer one must of necessity have a steamer trunk, she remarked to Ruth, whom Miss Emily regarded as untraveled, not knowing of the girl's childhood.

Also Susie Lemon wore a brand-new suit, and coat and hat and gloves, all of Miss Emily's providing. The two travelers were the marvel and admiration of the village, which turned out in a body to see them off.

"I'll be sure to send you a box of lily roots, my dear," called Miss Emily, from the car window, "and a box of fruit to everybody! Good-bye, and the Lord bless you, every one!"

"The poor, old body!" sniffed Mrs. Abner Green tearfully. "I'm every mite as glad as if it was me goin' to them islands. I'm gladder, for I wouldn't like to go—not at my age! And she'll come back well and strong, with the sunshine and good food—and my niece, too, praise be! Money's a wonderful power for good, child, if so be it's used right."

"It is—oh, it is indeed," agreed Ruth, heartily. "But I am surprised at that old man; he must have lived to most a hundred, for I mind how old he was when he come a-visitin' his kin."

"I'm told that Wales is very healthy," said Ruth, hastily. "Of course he had to live out his allotted days, you know, and it wasn't too late for Miss Emily. It was just the right time, indeed."

To which Mrs. Green agreed—it was indeed the right time!

AND now that the excitement of getting Miss Emily away was ended, there began some days of woeful waiting for Ruth, which she spent in self-communings that were doubting, fearing, uncertain. Suppose some loophole were left open and David Blair should find out her hand in his affairs? Would he scorn her, she wondered dully, for her interference? Would it hurt him even worse than if it were rejected, if he found that his book had been bought—by her money? Maybe he would expect great sales, be disappointed and in the end find out that he had been tricked—because she wanted him—just himself, not the genius.

"And the worst of it is, I can never, never be sure!" mourned Ruth, regarding her share in the experiment with dread. "Perhaps, after all, it would have been better if I had gone to him myself—told him that I had enough for both, and that I—but no, I could never, never have done that. I am a woman, I must suffer in silence!"

She heard from Miss Emily—a glowing letter from the Bermudas, enthusiastic over the climate and the benefits she and Susie were sure to derive from it. Already Miss Emily was planning for a party at the Old Home next summer, when she would entertain all her old friends and neighbors, and hunt up from somewhere a nice young man for Ruth, who was urged to take warning and never, never be an old maid like Miss Emily. For if Cousin David Ap David had not remembered Miss Emily in his will, what would have become of her!

"Ah me, I wonder if I will be an old maid?" sighed Ruth, as she read the old lady's advice with lips that trembled as they smiled, "I wonder!"

RESIGNEDLY she began to plan her future, if she were never to marry. She would give up her house and go away and live with her little girls in the John Carfax Home. She would be their matron, instructor, mother. She would rear them to be good, wholesome girls, capable of supporting themselves—trained housekeepers, homemakers, cooks and nurses. But she hoped, very, very much, that these girls would all marry, and make good wives and mothers, and come back on visits to the Home, bringing along their families for Ruth to admire. Yes, that would be a very contented life—useful, which was better than just selfish happiness.

And, when she had arrived at this conclusion, big tears would gather and splash down into her lap, if she were alone; if Ellen Hawtree were present the tears would just gather, but not be permitted to splash, for one day Ellen had witnessed her beloved's tears, and had bawled herself into hysterics at the sight. Thereafter Ruth always considered Ellen.

"I'll have ten little girls, if there's money enough afterwards," Ruth would muse, "if—if it doesn't take it all—oh, I would give it all, every dollar, so gladly, so gladly!"

And then, bravely swallowing back the lump in her throat, she would go on with her plans:

"And—if it should happen that I don't live with them myself, I will get the best, tenderest-hearted woman I can find to be their mother, instead. We will have a little hospital, where the neighbors will be glad to send their children, with a trained nurse to care for them, free. How I'll love the diet kitchen; I always did at school and it was so lovely to cook

An Ancient American Apartment-House

By ROBERT H. MOULTON

The apartments first uncovered. The mound on which the man is standing was used as a burial-place

GREAT community structures and religious sanctuaries, which challenge the admiration and constructive ability of our modern civilization, are being slowly unearthed by archeologists operating in what is known today as Chaco Canyon, New Mexico. Centuries ago these buildings were occupied by a race which now has passed into oblivion. In recent years the desert sands have been swept aside, revealing one wonder after another. The greatest wonder of all, however, came to light only a few months ago, when scientists from the School of American Research at Santa Fe excavated an apartment-house containing one thousand rooms.

In enduring, residential architecture the unknown people who constructed the building attained to levels not surpassed by the architects of the ancient world. The apartment-house, which has been entirely buried for centuries, would occupy two large blocks if set down in a modern American city, its great curved front extending for seven hundred feet. In its walls are fifty million pieces of quarried stone, not to mention thousands of logs, poles and slabs, which were cut in distant forests, transported by manpower, and set in place with the aid of implements of stone. The building, archeologists are satisfied, was erected, not by unwilling workers, who labored under the lash of priestly or kingly taskmasters, but by a people who took pleasure in what they were doing.

The excavating in Chaco Canyon was begun last spring and proceeded during the summer months. Work will be resumed this summer and will be continued for at least five years. The plans contemplate a study of the physiography of the region; a careful examination of the ruins; and a thorough study of the architecture, art, economic resources and ethnological relations of the inhabitants. In short, the undertaking is to uncover such facts as are obtainable concerning the extinct community of which Chaco Canyon is a part, and to produce, as far as such facts warrant, a picture of the life that was lived ages ago in this remote place. Today no written word of history exists concerning the ten thousand persons who called Chaco Canyon home a thousand or more years ago. Even the name by which they were known is lost. Perhaps somewhere in the ruins something will be found to tell of the blood language and cultural possibilities of these remarkable people.

The archeologists who are supervising the uncovering of the ruins in Chaco Canyon are satisfied that they are studying a people which matured in its culture without serious interruption, ran its course to the summit of its civilization and then went into oblivion. They believe that the people never cultivated more than 3,000 acres of land at any one time and never numbered more than 10,000. Evidences of decline, such as are seen in modern towns or pueblos in New Mexico and Arizona, are not visible here. All signs point to the fact that abandonment came at the full tide of life, except that there are no signs of sudden destruction.

THE first step taken at Chaco Canyon was to examine the area surrounding the ruin for refuse heaps and burial-places which, unless excavated first, might be lost under the debris from the buildings. A large oval mound a few yards to the east of the walls was divided from end to end by a broad trench and the work of excavation carried on there. The stratification of the mound was thus laid bare, and the successive layers, all of which were fairly clear, carried plentiful deposits of cultural remains, bone implements, and the usual refuse of domestic life. This was evidently used as a burial-place for the dead.

In excavating the building, an area ninety feet square was laid off. Upon completing the excavation it was found that the curved front was a building with a massive central axis and rooms on either side. It may have been two stories in height in places. The central wall is pierced by doorways all securely closed with masonry, originally affording communication between the rooms on the inner court and those facing outward. The exterior rooms are without outside openings on the level that remains. Outside this series of exterior rooms is a trench eight feet deep, two feet wide, between heavy walls of masonry, which for solidity could not be excelled unless built of modern concrete. Evidently this trench afforded a protective passage from the extreme southeast corner of the building to the northwestern quarter, 700 feet away.

The excavation of the southern extremity of the east wing of the building is disclosed two stories below ground. Looking down into the excavated rooms one gets a fair idea of the knowledge of construction possessed by these people who lived a thousand years ago. Partition walls are sometimes reinforced by embedding timbers in the masonry as concrete walls are reinforced with iron rods today. Floors and ceilings were constructed by first laying heavy supporting logs or poles across from wall to wall. Upon these were laid smaller logs or poles, placed closely side by side. Next came thin slabs of cedar and over them a layer of cedar bark. Upon this was a solidly packed layer of earth, kept hard and smooth by rubbing with smoothing stones. The views of some of the rooms show a remarkable state of preservation of both masonry and timber.

Archeologists are comparing the achievements of these native American builders with the much better-known works of an ancient civilization in the Old World. Chaco Canyon, as excavated, presents a building which, abandoned, unroofed and in some parts exposed to the elements, stands as very few specimen walls in any land have withstood the ages. It is said that in wall masonry the Chaco builders were unsurpassed, and that it may be doubted if our modern masonry will be as enduring.

Your Dollar in China

THE following cable message, dated Peking, May 4, has been forwarded to us through the Department of State at Washington:

"Drought in Chihli covering about twenty per cent. entire famine area threatens almost total loss spring crop. This means aid must continue until summer crops, say August, to about two million people now receiving aid. Situation in other districts promising. Though Chinese and other contributions have been substantial, American and Canadian funds already received have been saving factor to date."
(signed) CRANE.

ALL contributions to the Christian Herald Fund for the famine victims in China have traveled the same swift trail on their life-saving mission. No matter how small or how large the gift, each has helped, in its due proportion, to carry through the great task of feeding millions in North China, who would have died of starvation had the aid not reached them.

And that task, when the famine weeks have passed and life in the scourged regions becomes normal again, will stand as one of the greatest accomplishments ever made possible by generous giving and self-sacrifice. For the spirit of helpfulness has found expression in other ways than in gifts to the fund, tremendously important as these have been; it has been the controlling factor in the entire relief undertaking.

"About 300 foreigners, largely Americans from various parts of China and of various professions, have been devoting themselves to relief work, which has taken the form, chiefly, of free distribution of food, some clothing and some labor-giving relief." This brief message from Frederick W. Stevens, a member of the American Committee in China, tells only a part of the famine-field end of the story, for practically all who are serving there, foreigners and natives alike, are contributing their time and their service to the cause of the suffering.

It tells only a part, but it explains why almost the whole of every gift contributed here has gone out in actual food to the starving. And every phase of the conversion of a famine contribution into distributed food, is interesting. For many weeks the relief machinery has been working smoothly, here in America and over there in the remote villages of the stricken provinces 6,000 miles away. It will continue to work smoothly, efficiently and with a remarkably slight "overhead" cost to the Fund, until the last mess of grain has been given to the needy.

Every dollar that is received by the Christian Herald has been turned over at once to Vernon Munroe, treasurer of the American Committee for China Famine Fund, the national body which the Christian Herald was largely instrumental in organizing, and which represents the nation-wide effort to save the starving. And within two weeks that dollar accomplishes its mission.

From here it is promptly cabled to China through the Asia Banking Corporation or the International Banking Corporation, and without cost to the American Committee. As soon as the cable is received in Peking, the money is at once available at the offices of the bank in China, for the use of the American Committee there.

CHARLES R. CRANE, United States Minister to China, is chairman of this committee, which includes American missionaries and business men. Its method of dealing with the situation is thus explained in a recent cablegram from Mr. Stevens:

"Famine relief funds from America are being promptly allocated by a carefully selected and thoroughly representative American Advisory Committee of fourteen, who hold frequent meetings for that purpose. At least six of the members devote practically all of their time to the work: George L. Davis, John D. Hayes, Morgan Palmer and Dr. George D. Wilder, as members of the Peking United Committee; R. R. Gailey, as a member of the Shansi Committee, and J. Earle Baker for the American Red Cross.

"H. C. Emery, Roger S. Green and George L. Davis form a sub-committee appointed to plan and report recommendations as to the proportions in which relief funds should be divided according to the various needs among the famine relief organizations.

"By mutual consent the whole famine area was divided between these organizations several months ago, and the American Advisory Committee was charged with the duty of allocating funds to them.

"The Chinese Government provides free railroad transportation for famine relief workers and supplies, so that practically all money received for relief is used for purchasing grain which is distributed carefully and methodically after a careful investigation of the conditions and needs of the various districts. The records and accounts of relief expenditures are subject to the most careful scrutiny and supervision of chartered accountants who have been engaged for the purpose of conducting an audit."

At no time has money been allowed to accumulate to the credit of the committee in the banks in China; the need for what it will buy has been too great to permit of that. There never has been money enough to supply the full need. Therefore the great problem of the Committee in China has been to allocate the fund at its disposal at any given time to accomplish with it the greatest good.

As soon as decision is made that grain must go to a particular village, the grain is ordered, if the fund is sufficient. A wired message goes from Peking to a representative of the Committee stationed at a big grain market and shipping station. It instructs him not only how much grain to buy but where it shall be shipped.

Even in this purely commercial end of the task, the spirit of co-operation and helpfulness is not lacking. In Manchuria, which produced last year a most bountiful crop, the farmers have been disposing of their grain to the Committee on practically a cost basis.

Pursuant to directions the grain for a particular shipment goes, without any charge for the transportation, to the railroad distributing station nearest the point of destination.

In the beginning it was very generally feared that China's railroad system would prove incapable of meeting the strain of relief transport, and just at the start it did all but break down under the added burden; but an American, J. Earle Baker, who was put in charge of the roads during the famine emergency, soon had them operating so efficiently that famine grain has never since been delayed.

After tracing any shipment to the railroad distributing point, no matter which one, a contributor to the Fund interested in seeing where, in what form, and by what means his money is going, will find the problem of quick and inexpensive handling solved at each step forward in the journey.

A GRAPHIC description of the actual distribution of the relief supplies has been sent by Rev. H. Kerr Taylor, of the Southern Presbyterian Mission, Tsingkiangpu, Ku, China. He was transferred from his mission work to the supervision of an out-station near Siao-chang, Chihli, and his experience is typical of the operation of all the out-stations. His letter follows in part:

"The Siao-chang mission field, now the Siao-chang famine relief field, contains several thousand square miles, and for the present operations is divided roughly into ten circular districts, like so many clocks, each with a radius of about ten miles. I mention the clocks, for this will help to indicate the plan of operation in each of these out-stations where the actual work of relief is going on. Each of these ten circular districts is divided into eight or ten sectors, just as if you were

Germany Yields Unconditionally to Allied Ultimatum

WITH the French armies lined up ready for an immediate march into the Ruhr, Germany has submitted unconditionally to the ultimatum despatched by the Allies, after a week of the greatest tension since the signing of the Versailles Treaty, and the following pledge was given:

"The German Government is fully resolved: First, to carry out without reserve or condition its obligations as defined by the Reparations Commission.

"Second, to accept and carry out without reserve or condition the guarantees in respect of those obligations prescribed by the Reparations Commission.

"Third, to carry out without reserve or delay the measures of military, naval and aerial disarmament notified to the German Government by the Allied Powers in their note of January 29, 1921, those overdue to be completed at once, and the remainder by the prescribed date.

"Fourth, to carry out without reserve or delay the trial of war criminals and to execute the other unfulfilled portions of the Treaty referred to in the first paragraph of the note of the Allied Governments of May 5."

After the receipt of the Allied ultimatum, German opinion fluctuated violently and for a time it appeared that Dr. Stresemann, leader of the German People's Party, would be asked to form a cabinet which would reject the Allied demands. Moderate counsels prevailed, however, and President Ebert entrusted to Dr. Wirth, the Centrist leader, the task of extricating Germany from her perilous position. Dr. Wirth succeeded in assembling a cabinet in which he assumed the posts of Chancellor and Foreign Minister, and in which Gustav Bauer, former Chancellor, holds second rank as Vice-Chancellor and Minister of the Treasury.

The new Chancellor, in his first appearance before the Reichstag, advised the acceptance of the ultimatum with "the resolution to do our utmost to meet the obligations imposed upon us" and the Reichstag upheld his decision by a vote of 221 to 175. In this vote the Majority Socialists, Clericals, Independent Socialists and a few Democrats supported the Chancellor, while the Nationalist, German People's Communist and Bavarian People's parties wished to defy the Allies.

The Wirth ministry was a makeshift composed of Centrists, Majority Socialists and Democrats, and its tenure of office is precarious, as it can directly control only 225 of the 466 members of the Reichstag. It represents a swing away from the affiliations between the ministry and the big business group of Hugo Stinnes in the direction of Socialistic control. There was doubt in Berlin whether the ministry would have the strength to carry out a constructive program, and predictions were made that a reorganization would be necessary if it is to survive for long.

There was rejoicing in the Allied countries over the German surrender, but at the same time there was no disposition to believe that all troubles over reparations were at an end. The French were frankly skeptical and were anxious to see the German promises put into execution, and the British press was issuing warnings that there must be no relaxation of vigilance. The French Government announced that the 1919 class, which was mobilized in order to provide adequate forces for the Ruhr occupation, would be kept under arms until July 1, when Germany has engaged to complete disarmament, and a strong French army will be maintained until conditions are more settled.

Allies Disagree Over Silesia

WITH the Allied ultimatum answered, the German Government has an opportunity to turn its attention to the upper Silesian situation, and the Allies feared there would be serious clashes between the Polish invaders and German forces. Small German bands were said to have entered the district and the concentration of German troops near the scene of action was reported, but no serious conflict had occurred. The Allied forces in Upper Silesia were too weak to maintain peace, and none of the Allies has taken any step toward strengthening its contingent there.

Premier Lloyd George, in a speech before the House of Commons, denounced the Polish invaders, who have pushed forward until they occupy a considerable portion of the province, and declared the Allies must keep faith by seeing to it that the Polish resort to force does not swerve them from the path of strict justice under the Peace Treaty in disposing of Silesia. His intimation of a willingness to permit Germany to offer armed resistance if the Poles continue their aggressive policy evoked a storm of protest in France and caused Premier Briand to issue a stern warning against the despatch of German troops to the province. France has been Poland's protector and the clash between the two premiers over Poland's course strained relations severely, but exchanges were begun looking toward an agreement on means of settling the Silesian crisis in advance of the next meeting of the Allied Supreme Council. Premier Briand was to go before the French Chamber of Deputies before meeting Lloyd George.

America's Participation Defined

ASSURANCES that the American representatives in the councils of the Allies will hold aloof from distinctly European questions in which the United States has no direct concern have been given by the Harding administration to Senators who feared this country was likely to become seriously entangled in European concerns. In particular, the United States will not participate in the settlement of the Silesian problem, which involves questions of the fixation of boundaries and the determination of territorial control on the basis of a plebiscite. Very definite instructions have been sent to the American representatives, and when questions such as that of Silesia are under consideration their duties will be limited to reporting the facts to Washington. In Administration circles they were characterized as "posts of observation, protection and conservation" established to safeguard

American rights in a practical way; and President Harding considered that participation in the Allied deliberations was the only reasonable way in which our Government could be kept informed regarding matters which concerned it.

The Treaty irreconcilables were restive over the President's decision for American representation, but the only direct and open attack came from Senator LaFollette, who offered a resolution to place the Senate on record as opposing any participation in any of the Allied councils as contrary to American ideals and principles. Consideration of the LaFollette resolution was blocked, but it will afford a chance later for an attack on the Harding policies.

Bishop Manning Consecrated

THE consecration of Rev. Dr. William T. Manning as the tenth Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York was solemnized with imposing ceremonies, and was the occasion for a gathering which packed the Cathedral of St. John the Divine to the limit, with several thousands left outside. In the procession of 500 robed figures were twenty-nine Bishops, among them prelates of the Eastern Orthodox Church, and clergymen representing several Protestant denominations—an indication of the growing sense of unity among the churches. The officiating Bishop was Right. Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle of Missouri, presiding Bishop of the church, who is eighty-four.

Bishop Manning, in his inaugural address, emphasized the necessity for loyalty to the Government and to the guiding principles of the Church. The chief need was not more discipline, he said, but more of the spirit of love for each other in the fellowship of Christ. The Church must play her true part, he declared, in the solution of the great questions, social, industrial and economic, before the world, and can not be a mere sympathetic onlooker, but there should be a limit to the Church's interest in political matters.

At Bishop Manning's request two suffragan Bishops were elected; and the convention named Bishop Arthur S. Lloyd, who has been serving as rector of a White Plains church, and Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, rector of the Church of the Heavenly Rest. Both are regarded as of the Low Church wing, while Bishop Manning is a High Churchman.

DR. BURRELL HONORED. The thirtieth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. Dr. David James Burrell at the Marble Collegiate Dutch Reformed Church in New York City was celebrated with a dinner attended by 400 members and friends of the church. Dr. Burrell at seventy-six has the energy and enthusiasm of a man many years younger.

PERSHING TO BE CHIEF OF STAFF. Secretary Weeks has announced that General Pershing will succeed Major-General March as Chief of Staff of the Army on July 1.

MME. CURIE IN AMERICA. Mme. Marie S. Curie, who with her husband discovered radium, has arrived in America to receive from a group of women the gift of a gram of radium, worth $100,000. Mme. Curie, an unassuming, motherly appearing woman of fifty-three, was accompanied by her two daughters.

CHURCH LEADERS DISCUSS EDUCATION. Forty-five delegates, each representing a Protestant church agency engaged in educational tasks, met in a three-day conference at Garden City, Long Island. The chairman was Robert E. Speer, president of the Federal Council of Churches, and "An Adequate and Unified Educational Program for the Church" was the chief topic of discussion.

Germany Yields

AFTER exhausting the possibilities of diplomacy, and appealing in turn to Switzerland, to the Czechoslovaks, to Rome and to the United States for help, Germany has at last taken counsel of prudence and of her own economists and accepted the ultimatum of the Allies, covering the reparation terms. This virtually became assured when the new emergency Coalition Cabinet, in which Centrists, Majority Socialists and Democrats were represented, was organized. Even then, the coming change was accelerated by the threatening attitude of France, which had planned a new invasion and the occupation of the Ruhr in the event of Germany's refusal to sign the ultimatum. Coercion succeeded where all other means would have failed. The submission of Germany was unconditional.

Dr. Wirth and his associates did expeditious work in a difficult situation. On May 10, the Cabinet met and the decision was quickly reached that acceptance of the ultimatum, which would expire two days later, was the only course to be followed. In announcing this to the Reichstag, the Chancellor did not waste time in multiplying words. In a few brief sentences he presented the urgency of the situation, which was one that called for immediate action.

"Acceptance means," he said, "that we declare our readiness to bear in voluntary labor the heavy financial burdens demanded year by year. Refusal would, however, mean surrendering the basis of our entire industrial activities, and, as a consequence, dismemberment of our economic body, already so greatly weakened, and the shackling of our entire industrial life. The unity and freedom of Germany had weighed most with the new Cabinet, and the Ministry had decided to accept the London terms, which they would undertake to fulfil within the limits of Germany's capacity. This would be only possible through the work and energy of the people."

It had been stipulated that there could be no discussion or amendment of the Allied ultimatum; it called for a definite "Yes" or "No." On being submitted to the Reichstag after Dr. Wirth had spoken, 221 members voted for acceptance and 175 against. Tension was evident, but there was no excitement. The decisive step had been taken by which Germany agreed to pay the total amount assessed by the Reparations Commission; also to carry out the obligations prescribed by the Commission "without reserve or condition," and the disarmament measures, military, naval and aerial proposed by the Allies, and to bring the war criminals to trial without delay.

That scene in the Reichstag while the vote was being taken is one that doubtless will be long remembered. The last of a great drama, it has no parallel in history. And if Germany in good faith keeps her newly made pledges, what to many has seemed a national surrender that could spell nothing but ruin may yet prove to be the means of Germany's rehabilitation on a stable basis, and lead to her ultimate restoration in the confidence and respect of all nations alike.

Kansas Industrial Court

AGREAT many people discuss public questions without knowing the facts about them. This habit is American. Ask the average American citizen about the Kansas Industrial Court and he will give a plump and downright opinion, many times against it. But ask him if he has ever read the law, and he will say no. All he knows about it, or thinks he knows is that it is a legal device made by capital as opposed to labor to take away the workingman's only weapon against capitalistic tyranny, the strike.

As a matter of fact, clearly and repeatedly stated in the Kansas Industrial Court law, there are two great principles embodied in the law which created the Court.

The first of these is the sensible provision made by the Court in its guarantee that industrial disputes involving fair wages or fair labor given, will be solved justly, while the parties are at work. In other words, instead of quitting labor on account of a grievance or a wrong condition, the workers agree to continue production, trusting to an unbiased court to make the necessary right adjustment. This is a sensible and fair attitude for labor to take, for it insures wages going on during the settlement of the controversy, and keeps up the necessary production of the particular commodity, which in very many cases like coal mining and printing and other industries affect directly the general public.

The second principle for which the Kansas Industrial Court has been created is the principle that if a strike on the part of labor in any particular industry imperils the public welfare, those who incite to such a cessation of labor are liable to be convicted for the act. Surely it must be as much a part of a loyal citizen to work as to stop working, especially when the production of certain articles of every-day necessity is necessary for the public welfare. Suppose all the men who furnish milk for the big cities should suddenly refuse to handle milk, all the farmers should suddenly refuse to milk their cows because the price paid was not just what they thought it ought to be, is there any workingman who does any thinking who would say, "Let the strike against getting milk into the city go on, no matter how many babies die?"

The Kansas Industrial Court is not a tyrannical act aimed by the capitalistic class against the working class. It is created to protect the workingman and the general public. It is time that the laboring men of this country and the corporations learned that in the constant fights that have been going on for half a century between capital and labor it is the general public that always suffers, and the general public out in Kansas is getting very tired of being the "innocent bystander." We are tired of being hit by the bricks thrown by both capital and labor, and the Industrial Court is a hint that Kansas does not propose to be the target for the quarrels of either party.

More than thirty cases of dispute have already been up before the Kansas Court, and justice and fair dealing have been noticeable in the decisions. It is significant that not one case has yet been appealed.

The statement that the Industrial Court was created by a group of capitalists is false. The law was passed by a farmer legislature and has been unanimously declared constitutional by the Kansas Supreme Court.

The Christian Herald and the Movies

THERE are doubtless many readers of the Christian Herald who, like the writer of the following letter, have been watching with steadily growing interest the result of the efforts of this journal to secure a much needed reform in the movies, that we accord it a place on the editorial page:

"Dear Editor:

"Let me congratulate you and the grand old Christian Herald for the excellent work you have done in bringing the movie-producing companies into line for a thorough moral clean-up. You have set the ball in motion, and I trust it will not stop until it goes over the whole course.

"Let me assure you that you have not only the warm support of your subscribers in the attitude you have taken, but you have earned respect in tens of thousands of homes all through this country, the heads of which feel that you are fighting the battle for the sake of the younger generation, and that the formation of youthful life and character depends largely on the issue.

"It was hard for me to understand the Christian Herald's policy on the movies at first, as I felt that anything connected with these pictures was bad and undeserving of the support of good people. Therefore, I followed your editorials very closely. The other day, when the leading companies of the moving-picture industry announced 'their new standards of practice,' in which they are very evidently eliminating the undesirable features in their business, I just felt that we readers of the Christian Herald had been a big influence in helping you accomplish this.

"I have full confidence in the Christian Herald, and believe you are in a position to know how to accomplish the result better than we who are striving individually to keep this old world of ours fine and clean.

"With grateful regard,

"NEW JERSEY SUBSCRIBER."

While it is pleasant to note such hearty appreciation, and to feel that our readers stand shoulder to shoulder with us in this enterprise, as they have done so often on former occasions, there is one thing we wish to add. It is only just to say here that in our contact with the representatives of all the leading film concerns, we were gratified to find them wholly alive to the necessity of reform such as they are now planning, and which would forever remove from the business the stigma of impropriety and make the movies safe, clean, enjoyable, instructive and desirable to all. We regard the present situation as giving excellent promise of the practical realization of this program in the near future.

Industrial Missions

THERE is one romance of missions that the average church member hears little about, and the non-church member nothing at all—the industrial mission. Added to the familiar activities of missionary life—the evangelistic, educational and medical—is this new work which is just as highly specialized and which seeks primarily to improve the economic status of the native population. Such an improvement logically might be expected to result in a more sympathetic attitude toward the labor of the missionary along the three lines of earlier effort, because it frequently is true that a man who is happy and prosperous in his work, is more inclined to new thought on religion, education and sanitation, than the man who devotes his waking hours to a struggle for bread.

The industrial missionary provides one of the great present-day romances of the Church, not only because he is embarking on comparatively uncharted seas, but because he is opening up hitherto unsuspected social problems in every backward country in the world. He is in truth attempting a new scientific contribution to the social Christian progress of humanity.

There have been isolated articles on industrial mission work, and occasional reports to missionary conferences, but the Christian Herald has obtained the first comprehensive survey of this new phase of Protestant activity that has been offered to the Christian people of the United States. It is not statistical; it is not dogmatic. On the contrary, it is a human story of what missionaries can do to improve the social and physical condition of the natives among whom they labor, together with suggested question "Are we justified in turning nations like China and India into highly industrialized countries such as the United States, Japan and England with all their complex problems of sociology, politics and economics?"

The manuscript is called "Industrial Missions" with the sub-title, "An Approach to the Economic Situation in Missionary Countries" and is the result of more than a year's work and study on the part of Miss Winifred L. Chappell, now prominently identified with the foreign work of the Y. W. C. A. It will appear in the Christian Herald in an early number, and will be completed in three long instalments. Every member of every foreign missionary society should read it and preserve it.

Then and Now

AT THE launching of one of our battleships recently one of the speakers called all citizens of this republic who are asking for disarmament, "pacifists and fools," and said the terms were synonymous.

Another speaker on that occasion made the unqualified statement: "Disarmament will never be possible."

It seems a pity that the prophet Joel was not present at the launching of this battleship. For he had the audacity some time ago to predict a time when the nations would "beat their swords into plowshares, their spears into pruning-hooks, and nation would make war against nation no more."

Perhaps Joel was mistaken and the honorable gentleman at the launching was right. However, we are going to put our faith on Joel. We prefer to join the ranks of the "fools" so far as disarmament is concerned, and stay with Joel and a lot of other "fools" who in all the ages have believed in the impossible. No doubt the people in Joel's time "haw-hawed" when he declared himself for disarmament, and said with the honorable gentleman as above, "It can never be done, Joel. Don't you believe it."

Still it does seem a little queer that all the people who want to put an end to war and the cost of it should be called "fools." And the people who want to create the "biggest navy in the world" should be the only "patriots."

In spite of all that, we believe there are several million citizens in this republic willing to stand up with Joel instead of the honorable gentleman who said he was mistaken.

How National Sins Are Punished

TEXT—Prov. 14:34. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

IN THE long line of the Kings of Israel and Judah, the same monotonous story of alternating good and evil is repeated over and over—the reign of the good kings accompanied by at least comparative prosperity; the reign of the bad kings followed, almost universally, by disaster and defeat. Unlike the kings of Judah, the kings of Israel were almost uniformly bad. All that can be said is that some were less bad than others, and Israel was sooner destroyed.

Some rationalistic commentators have suggested that this sequence of prosperity always accompanying a good reign, and adversity as certainly accompanying an unrighteous reign, is too uniform to be true. They tell us that the chroniclers have twisted the facts to fit their theories and convictions of what should be true. Yet all history in the long run is on the side of the chroniclers. Bad governments have often been accompanied by temporary success, good governments by temporary failure. But it always has been true, as it always will be true, that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people"; that sooner or later the right will win. The compilers of the books of Kings and Chronicles were evidently taking long views, looking back over many years of history, and the moral of their histories has been confirmed by the centuries since.

Consider the story of one king in the long succession of Israel's rulers. Hoshea, King of Israel, evidently was not so bad a king as some. It is but a poor compliment, however, to say that "he did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah, yet not as the kings of Israel that were before him." When we remember the story of Jeroboam and Ahab, both of whom "made Israel to sin," which was the oft-repeated title of infamy given to the former, we see that Hoshea at the best, was damned with very faint praise. It would be like saying of one of the later emperors of Rome that, though a bad man, he wasn't quite as bad as Nero and Caligula.

IN THE reign of Hoshea, however, all the accumulated evils of many previous reigns seem to have come to a head, and punishment, long delayed, fell upon Israel. Hoshea was evidently a tricky and untrustworthy man. While pretending to be a loyal vassal of Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, who had conquered him, he was really intriguing with So, king of Egypt. Suspecting this conspiracy against him, Shalmaneser attacked Samaria, the capital of the kingdom of Israel, and after a three years' siege, captured it and "carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Haleh, and on the Habor, the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." In this single sentence the wholesale deportation and destruction of a nation is recorded. Israel never recovered her power, while concerning Hoshea himself it is said that "the king of Assyria shut him up and bound him in prison."

But it was not alone the king's wickedness that brought destruction upon the nation. The people were doubtless quite as much to blame as he. Like king, like people. It is also true that like people, like king. Hoshea had a chance to stem the tide of idolatry, but he did not improve it, and he and his people rushed headlong to ruin.

The two great sins of Israel were conformity to the world around them, and idolatry, which was the result of this conformity. The people, we are told, walked in the statutes of the nations whom Jehovah cast out from before the children of Israel. They set them up pillars and Asherim upon every high hill and under every green tree. They served idols whereof Jehovah had said unto them. Ye shall not do this thing . . . they forsook all the commandments of Jehovah, their God, and made them molten images, even two calves . . . And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divination and enchantments, and sold themselves to do that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah, to provoke him to anger.

SUCH is the terrible indictment of our lesson against the people of Israel. The root of their sin and their sorrow is the root of all modern sin and sorrow—the ignoring of God and His laws through conformity to the world. This is the all-embracing, all-comprehensive sin of our own as well as of ancient times. It is the sin that destroys nations today as surely as it did two millenniums ago. It ruins individual lives, it weakens our churches, it corrupts our cities, it may bring everlasting woe upon our own nation, as it did upon the kingdom of Israel.

The boy or girl who goes to an unholy, demoralizing movie, or an indecent dance, because others do, is committing the sin of Israel. The man who practises the dishonesties of big or little business, because others do, is committing the sin of Israel. The woman who clothes herself like a libertine, and neglects her household for the bridge-table, because it is the fashion in some circles, is committing the sin of Israel.

The church that caters to the world in its amusements, and admits anyone to its membership because of his wealth or influence, is committing the sin of Israel. The community that elects corrupt men to office, because it is easier to go with the tide than efficiently to protest against or resist corruption, is committing the sin of Israel. The nation that is afraid to enact good laws or to enforce them when enacted, because of the opposition of bad men; the nation that cherishes hate, malice and jealousy against other nations; the nation that puts its trust in generals and armies, in "reeking tube and iron shard," in submarines and bombing-planes and poison gas, because other nations do the same, is committing the sin of Israel.

Such people, communities and nations cannot

Him, too, for the long line of worthy and, for the most part, Christian presidents, from Washington to Harding, who have striven to make America a people whose God is the Lord.

Yet are our skirts wholly free from blood? Was the Mexican War waged wholly in the interests of Justice? In liberating Cuba, were we wholly free from vengeance and self-interest? In taking the Canal Zone, were we fair to Colombia? In more recently intervening in San Domingo and Haiti, did we simply have the best good of the native peoples in view?

I am not arraigning our government. Most of these questions are still in dispute. Unbiased history has not yet given her decision, but it is well that we be not too sure that our own garments are all spotless.

I do know that some acts of generosity and justice have greatly redounded to our real glory. Some conspicuous acts of righteousness have greatly exalted our nation. A good many years ago some American filibusters captured one of the Lobos Islands off the Coast of Peru. Plenty of excuses could be found by a grasping nation for keeping possession. The island was rich in guano. America needed the fertilizer. She could make a better use of it than Peru. She could add to the agricultural wealth of the world if she took it over. How plausibly we can hear the wily politicians make out their case!

An American warship was sent to the Lobos Islands to investigate the report. Our government decided that the island belonged to Peru, and of course ordered off the American buccaneers who had taken possession. Peru has been our fast friend ever since. When, a few years ago, Secretary Root made his memorable tour to South America, none received him so cordially as the Peruvians, and the president of the Republic in his address of welcome referred to the Lobos incident as one reason for Peru's friendship. Being there about the same time myself, I heard many allusions to this act of righteousness, which had so exalted our nation.

In 1900 the Boxer Rebellion startled the world. All the leading nations sent small armies to rescue the beleaguered diplomats and missionaries in Peking, and to put down the rebellion. They soon succeeded, and at very moderate outlay. All the other nations charged China with the expenses involved, and millions besides, in punitive damages. Our nation took from distracted China only the bare expenses of the expedition, and returned some millions of dollars. Part of this has been used by China in sending hundreds of Chinese students to America, and part in building the fine Indemnity College in Peking. Today America is regarded as China's best friend. "Righteousness exalteth a nation."

WE NEED to illustrate our text no further. Ancient and modern history confirm the Bible story. When will the kingdoms and republics of this world learn that the nations that desert God are deserted by Him—rather, that those who cut themselves off from Him and forget to deal justly and love mercy and walk humbly, debase themselves and seal their own doom?

As I write, momentous decisions are being made by some of the nations of the world. If greed and vengeance prevail, the late conquerors will be conquered. If righteousness, justice and mercy rule the day, the disrupted and famished old world will come out into a new atmosphere of peace, good-will, righteousness and permanent prosperity.

Our own nation cannot stand aloof. Whether she will or not, her own future is bound up with the future of the world. In her influential and incomparable position of wealth and influence, she can lead the way, if she will, in reduction of armaments and to final disarmament. She can avert the calamity of another great war. No other nation is in such an enviable position to do this as our own.

May God grant that America and all the nations of the world, in this crisis of history, may choose the right path, to honor and true exaltation!

NOTABLE gains in virtually every department of home mission work are shown in the statistics for 1920, just issued in the annual report of the Home Missions Council and the Council of Women for Home Missions. The appropriations totaled $23,135,601 as against $14,649,828 for 1919; and the number of missionaries fully supported by boards increased from 3,369 to 4,473 and the number of native workers increased from 544 to 1,226. The number of missionaries partly supported by the boards decreased from 13,750 to 12,176. The largest expenditure was $6,023,130 for church and parsonage buildings as against $2,295,232 for 1919.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"All Hail, the Power of Jesus' Name," or "Blessed Assurance."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 103. Verses 1 to 17 inclusive.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 394, first column).

Sermon—"HOW NATIONAL SIN SARE PUNISHED"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Sweet Hour of Prayer," or "Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

If the Truth as here spoken and prayed has made us more sure of the Love of God, more confident of His forgiveness and more willing to do His will, make us true to what we have heard, as we go our ways into a world which has heard the angels' song and felt the tread of the Master's feet, as He walked the dusty road beside His disciples. In Jesus' Name we ask it. AMEN.

escape the woes of Israel. History has repeated and underscored these lessons over and over again. Charles the First, for his dishonesty and contempt of the people, was succeeded by Cromwell and his Ironsides; Cromwell, with all his splendid traits and his rule, never to be forgotten or minimized, was harsh and cruel in Ireland, and, toward the end, arrogant if not selfish, and thus he prepared the way for the licentious era of Charles the Second. The ribald looseness of this reign and the obstinacy of his brother, James the Second, made inevitable the triumph of William of Orange. The foolish tyranny of George the Third split the British Empire in two, and gave birth to the young Republic of the West. The overweening arrogance of Napoleon and his belief that Providence was on the side of the biggest battalions, resulted in his disastrous invasion of Russia, in the battle of Waterloo, and in St. Helena.

AND this last and greatest of wars, what is this but a repetition of the old, old story of trust in big battalions and big battleships and every instrument of war which the devilish ingenuity of man can devise, rather than in the principles of the Prince of Peace? The starvation of Europe, the horrors in the Near East, the mountainous debts of all the nations, the worthless currencies of most of them, all tell us that peoples who conform to the evil spirit of the times, who trust in guns rather than in God, will, in some way or other, to a greater or lesser degree, meet the overthrow and destruction which scattered and peeled the people of Israel.

We may well thank God that our nation has been comparatively free from the most glaring national sins of self-aggrandizement. We may well thank

The Graces of True Knighthood

SUNDAY. I Pet. 3:8. "Be ye all compassionate, loving as brethren, tender-hearted, humble-minded." Is it disappointing that the apostle should give emphasis to graces which we commonly associate with women rather than with men? I have called them the softer graces; perhaps I ought to have called them the riper fruit. The ultimate expression of the strongest tree is its sweetest and ripest fruit. The tender, exquisite color of a ripening acorn is the finest expression of the oak. Hearts of oak reach their finished achievement in the softest hues of their ripest fruit. Manliness is never perfected until it issues in tenderest grace. Therefore I am not surprised to find the apostle giving prominence to the finished and ripened attainments in sanctified life. What, again, are their names?

"Compassion." The range of a man's life is just the range of his compassions, which is only another name for the range of his correspondences. Death is just the destruction of all correspondence. The dying lose correspondence after correspondence; nerve after nerve and sense after sense collapse; communications are slowly broken; and by gradual paralysis and benumbment all correspondences end. The measure of my life is determined by the quality and quantity of my correspondences.

This is true of the life of the flesh. It is true in the realm of the mind. How much am I in touch with? What is the range of my interests? What are my correspondences? It is true in the domains of the soul. How much do I live? That depends upon my compassion, my responsiveness, my "correspondence." What is the extent of my fellow-feeling? What is my power of apprehending and realizing my brother, and by the ministry of an unveiling imagination planting myself in the heart of his interests and estate? That is one of the rarest attainments in the sanctified life. The Lord refines His disciples into compassionateness. He indefinitely enlarges their correspondences. He endows them with sensitive passion, with profundity of feeling.

"Tenderheartedness." That carries one a step further than compassion. Tenderheartedness is more than correspondence; it is gentle ministry. It includes the service of the tender hand. It not only feels the pains of others; it touches the wounds with exquisite delicacy. Even the pitiful man can be clumsy. Six men may have the sympathy, but only one of the six may be able to touch the wound so as to heal it. The Lord will add a gentle hand to our compassion. He will take away all brusqueness, all spiritual clumsiness, so that in the very ministry of pity we may not "break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax."

"Humble-mindedness." Surely that adds a still richer bloom to the heavenly grace! The Lord will not only give us a heart of compassion; it shall be compassion rid of all brusqueness; it shall also be purged of all superciliousness and pride! It shall be "humble-minded." Even pity may wear some of the garments of pride!

There is something bitter and offensive in all compassion which moves in patronage. The Man whose "compassions failed not" was "meek and lowly in heart!" Pity is petrifying when it comes from pride; it is soothing and healing when it flows from the humble mind, and this is the perfected grace of the sanctified life. J. H. J.

Breaking the Chains

MONDAY. Jer. 13:23. "Can the Ethiopian change his spots?" The word "habit" comes from the Latin habere, meaning to have or to hold. A habit is a thing that takes hold of us; and the tighter it holds the better it fits us. The word, it thus appears, is applicable to either clothes or character. We wear our habits as we wear our clothes. But there are some differences.

For one thing, we can not acquire our habits as we do our clothes. They can not be bought either "ready-made" or "made-to-order." One may get a reputation in this manner at any newspaper office, but not a character; for while a character is an earned outfit, a reputation is only what people say about us. The latter is provided by our neighbors, whether we like it or not; but the former is always home-made.

Nor can we dispose of them at will. You can sell a threadbare coat to an "old clo' man"; but an old habit is like the fabled shirt of Nessus; when it comes off it takes the flesh with it. And what's the use, anyway, so long as the root of the matter remains in us? It is like cutting back a thorn bush, only to have the strength of the amputated twig show itself in a more vigorous growth somewhere else. For habit is simply an outgrowth of indwelling sin; and good resolutions are local applications that do not reach the source and center of it.

Moreover our habits are not laid aside when we lie down for our last sleep. What we call death is only a man's moving out of the house he had been living in; all that is himself lives right on. Wherefore it is written, "He that is righteous let him be righteous still, and he that is holy let him be holy still; he that is unjust let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy let him be filthy still." In other words eternity finds us as time leaves us.

Is the case desperate, then? If a character made up of evil habits can not be laid aside at will, nor worn out, nor removed by shuffling off this mortal coil, what shall a sinner do? There is nothing to be done but to call God in. Our extremity is His opportunity. It was because there was no hope elsewhere that He made bare His arm on Calvary in our behalf. His only-begotten Son came to break every chain and bid the oppressed go free. D. J. B.

The Search for Eternal Life

TUESDAY. Matt. 19:16. "What good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" The question we should ask in connection with Eternal Life is not "what shall I do?" but "what shall I be?" The Jew, with all his ceremonialism, was madly endeavoring to do the will of God. So intent was he upon this that not only had he made that doing a difficult thing for himself, but he had hedged up the way for others until they fairly groaned under the impositions.

When Paul entered Athens, he was stirred because he saw the Greeks doing at least what they thought to be the will of the gods. They had built a multiplicity of altars, seemingly filled with the idea that if the works of their hands could avail, they would not be behind others in doing.

And all of this was good in its rightful place and at the proper time. These things as the fruits of eternal life may be very good indeed, but as the conditions of eternal life they lead to wrong conclusions. Simon made the greatest blunder of his life when he offered money to the apostles, saying, "Give me this power that I may do." Little wonder they told him that he was still in the "gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity." What a difference there might have been had he understood the matter sufficiently to say "teach me how to give myself to this Power so that I may BE."

And so with the young man of the text, his idea of Eternal Life was doing some good deed, working his way into the Kingdom, or buying the right, if you please. His goodness and evident sincerity were not sufficient however, for when Jesus conditioned Eternal Life upon a surrender of the life that now is, the test was too great for him.

"What shall I do that I may have eternal life?" Do nothing, just "become." "What shall I 'become'?" Become nothing; he that loseth his life shall find it in life eternal. I. D. L.

Honoring God

WEDNESDAY. I Sam. 2:30. "Them that honor me I will honor." The complaint of God against an ancient people was, "This people honor me with their lips; they draw near me with their mouth, but have removed their heart from me." That was the curse of a merely formal faith. Not so is God honored, but with a vital faith, interpreted by life.

The prophet Micah gives us a very searching word about what God requireth—the practice of justice and mercy and the humble walk with God. The humble walk with God—this means the common life of every common day filled with the sense of God. This means not the life of the minister alone, the professional teacher of religion, but the life of "the servant in the house," the housekeeper, the child at work or play, the nurse, the teacher, the tiller of the soil, the business men. The poet lived in such a world who saw "every common bush aflame with God." The schoolmaster lived in it who said, "Again and again I thrill when I get a vision of a child's soul when it comes to me fresh from the hands of God." "Sister Dora" lived in such a world—the nurse who always looked at a motto on her wall, when the bell rang calling her to duty. The motto read, "The Master is come and calleth for thee." That New York merchant lives in such a world who recently wrote, "If it were not for my belief that here and now I am serving God, I would not stay at this desk a minute longer." All such souls are honoring God.

There is no other way to honor God but by recognizing His presence in the world and His right to reign over it. Prayer is a form of that recognition. All worship is a form of it. Reverence, charity, friendship, are forms of it. The love of Nature with a heart that sees beyond the visible gratitude for the gifts of life, is among the finest forms of this recognition. C. C. A.

Traveling the Hard Road

THURSDAY. Prov. 13:15. "The way of transgressors is hard." I am prepared to believe it. My own limited experience tells me so. My observation confirms it. All of the transgressors that I know admit that the above is a true statement. I have never found anyone to dispute it. Human beings are proving it every day to their own satisfaction. Why do not more of us take the word of another and spare ourselves painful and costly adventures in "the hard way"? Why this everlasting mania for demonstrating what is already proven beyond shadow of a doubt?

Once the writer found a sign-post over a road in the Rockies, which read as follows: "This road has been abandoned; all who travel it do so at their own peril." Nothing was to be gained, and there was grave risk, as some had already discovered to their sorrow.

The experience of the race is cumulative and convincing, and new-born generations ought to take advantage of it. The paths of life bear significant inscriptions and legends, traced in the blood of the many who have gone this way before us.

The wages of sin have been fixed by an immutable law; they are the same throughout all generations. The modern sinner gets no more and no less than "before the War." W. L. G.

The Challenge of Big Things

FRIDAY. Isa. 19:20. "And he shall send them a Saviour and a great One and he shall deliver them." The Gospel is a tonic of big things. God does everything in a big way. There is nothing small, petty, mediocre or narrow in His plan and purposes for the human race. Men with narrow horizons and limited viewpoints are content to dwell in the valley of little things, but men with the vision splendid of big things and broader minds climb the height and thrive only on the mountain. The times demand mountain-top dwellers, big thinkers, big doers.

Let us think big in the pulpit and in the pew, in the week-day school and in the Sunday school. Let us pray big prayers, plan big deeds, live big lives, write big things, speak big things, so as to be in harmony with the plans of God as revealed in a great Saviour. It is our duty to think imperially. Says William Watkinson on this subject, "It is only when we realize our relation to the ages, to all who came before us, to all who will succeed us, striving to do our duty to the whole, that we are conscious of dignity, strength and satisfaction. Best of all, let us recognize in its fullness the government of God bringing in the Kingdom of Jesus Christ; here we have the sum of all great causes. To plan and pray for the establishment of the Kingdom, Christ's reign in the whole earth, is indeed to think imperially." Living in a small world, men dwindle and wither; but as knowledge and imagination, faith and hope, make us citizens of a vaster universe, corresponding characters of glory are imprinted on our souls.

Florence Barclay in The Rosary makes the doctor say to his patient: "See a few big things. Go in for the big things. You will like to remember, when you are bothering about pouring water in and out of teacups, that Niagara is still flowing." R. B.

The Nobility of Sacrifice

SATURDAY. I John 3:16. "He laid down His life for us, and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." Love that refuses to die for others is not love in the highest sense. Was it not a greater sacrifice for Abraham to surrender his son Isaac than to offer himself? Parental dedication means the surrender of your child for the Master's vineyard in any land. A father once said to his daughter, "I would give you to a noble man, and I will not refuse to give you to Jesus for the glory of His Kingdom. I know He will bless you and bless me in the sacrifice."

If one can lay down his life for liberty or for his country, how much more willing to make the sacrifice for God and his fellows; God gave His Son that we might not perish, but have everlasting life. Can we follow in His train and dedicate our families to His service? Life that does not mean consecration is a failure. Think of Jesus washing the dusty feet of Judas and wiping them with tender care, and then going out to die for Judas' salvation. Was ever love so lowly and devoted? Remember poor Oates, in the Scott expedition to the South Pole, who said to his dying comrades, "I am just going outside and may be away some time." He knew he was going out into the blizzard to die, to save the lives of the remaining company. Such sacrifice means exaltation forever! E. W. C.

Taking Your Medicine

I'M SICK in bed as I write this. I won't be, I'm sure, when you read it—for magazines go to press several days before readers see them—but I'm sick now! I have a sore throat and a headache and a great many of the other disagreeable things that go with tonsillitis. And just at present I'm rebelling against taking a dose of particularly unpleasant medicine—medicine that is dark and sticky and bitter.

It was three days ago that the doctor first told me to take the bitter medicine. And it was three days ago that I first rebelled. I argued like a lawyer, like a politician, and like a child who is trying to prove that he didn't take the jam out of the pantry. I used old arguments and new arguments; I used stupid arguments, and the very best arguments at my command. And then finally, and with many a wry face, I took the medicine just as I took it the two succeeding days, and just as I will take it today, when I have argued a trifle longer against taking it!

For that is the curious thing about taking your medicine. It doesn't matter how much you argue, how much you struggle, or how much you evade, or how downright unpleasant you get! The fact remains that the medicine's there! And that, usually, it has to be swallowed down—no matter how bitter it may be!

JESSIE TORRANCE lived two doors from me in a certain little suburban town. She was a sweet girl and a pretty girl and I liked her exceedingly—yes, and admired her! For she was older than I by several years—and several years count greatly when one is under twenty. Jessie Torrance was sweet and pretty, that I have said before. But in the eyes of the town, and of her family, she had one very glaring fault. The family said she had "a mind of her own." The town said that she was "set."

Jessie Torrance became engaged—when she was somewhere around nineteen—to one of the town boys. He had loved her for a long while and we were all glad, for his sake, when Jessie appeared one day with his ring upon the third finger of her slim white hand.

During the days of her engagement I was Jessie's shadow and slave. I was not quite sixteen and the romance of life was just beginning to take on a rosy tinge for me. When she gave a luncheon, or when somebody got up a shower for her I wrote little jingles to be read and sometimes painted wee place cards. That admitted me, in some small respects, to the charmed circle of Jessie Torrance's close friends—under ordinary circumstances I would have been considered quite beyond the pale because of my youth.

And so it was that I happened to be present on the day that Jessie Torrance announced the breaking of her engagement. It was only two weeks before the date for her marriage that she told her girl friends, who had arranged a surprise party for her, that she was afraid she'd have to send back the embroidered things that they'd been giving her, and the little home-made knickknacks.

"You see," she said, just as calmly as if she were talking about the weather, "you see I'm not engaged to Jack—that was the boy's name—any more!"

Of course the girls besieged her with questions, while I sat by with wide eyes and an open mouth. But she answered never a word—only laughed and talked about nothings, and made fragrant tea for us.

ON THAT afternoon—and on each of the many afternoons that followed I came to understand why Jessie had been called "set." For, as far as I know, she made not a single explanation to a soul, not even to her mother, about her broken engagement. Somehow, perhaps with the intuition of budding womanhood, I guessed that it had been entirely her fault—for if it

You May Put It Off, but You'll Have to Swallow It Some Day

dusk came—hovering near the place where the Torrance hedge dipped into the deepest shadows.

I, my eyes filled with the rose color of romance, expected affairs to be patched up almost any day—you see I had always greatly admired Jessie Torrance. So did the girls who were her chums, and so did her family. I even think that Jack expected her to come down, some time at dusk, to the place where the hedge dipped into the shadows. But she never came. And the weeks grew into months, and the months became a year, and I moved to the city. And, because I saw Jessie Torrance only occasionally, I didn't think, very often, about her broken love affair.

And then the war came to us. And with it came the flurry of drums and the blare of the trumpets, and the throb of patriotism and the heart-break of partings. And I—like all American women—carried a sick soul under the smile that I struggled to make brave. And I tried to knit mufflers (I do it very badly) and parts of them were wet with my tears.

And then, one day, Jessie Torrance came into my office and sat down beside my desk. And as I looked up from my work I saw that she was no longer a pretty shallow girl—that she had become a woman, quite suddenly. And I said: "Well?" Just that, like a question. And she said just as briefly, "Jack's in camp, awfully near. And I'm going down to say good-bye to him. He sails tomorrow. Will you go with me?"

OF COURSE I went. And of course I was curious. But I didn't ask any questions. I knew Jessie. Well, I didn't have to ask any questions when at last we got through the wall of M. P.'s and red tape and found Jack. For Jessie went straight to him with her slim hand outstretched.

"Jack," she said, "you probably don't care, any more, about things that happened seven years ago" (I hadn't dreamed that it was so long), "but if you do, I want to tell you that I'm sorry for all the silly things that I said to you one evening. I've wanted to say that I was sorry ever since the next day."

Jack looked at her blankly. And then a great light began to dawn on his face. But when he spoke, he spoke rather stupidly.

"Then why," he questioned, "didn't you say so?"

For a moment Jessie hesitated, and then:

"I'm stubborn," she said. "And it was hard for me to make an admission. It was like having a glass of horrid medicine before me—and putting off swallowing it. It took something very big to make me into enough of a regular person to take my medicine."

It was just about then that Jack kissed her.

The story ended happily. For Jack came home safely from the war, and he and Jessie were married. But I'll never forget what he said to me, just before the wedding.

"This might have happened a good many years ago," he told me rather sadly. "We've missed such a lot of real joy!"

EVERYBODY who puts off taking their medicine, is doing what Jessie Torrance did. Their medicine may be very different from hers, and the result of not taking it may be very different—but the principle is the same. For if life is to be met honestly and squarely the bitter draughts of life must be swallowed—and putting off taking them won't make them any the less bitter when the time comes.

If I take my medicine now (and I'm pretty sure that I will), I'll be well much sooner than I will be if I put off taking it. And that's my moral!

had not been her fault no power on earth would have kept Jack, the rejected suitor, away. Indeed, one could often see him—when

Making the Nation Christian

International Sunday-School Lesson for June 5
Psa. 33:12; Prov. 14:34; Rom. 13:1-10

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THE Christian nation is dependent on the Christian neighborhood and that in turn is determined by the Christian home. There is very close relationship between the lessons of the present quarter. Next week the outreach of thought is to the Christian world. In all this development the unit must never be lost sight of—the individual Christian.

For the Bible background read the three passages indicated above and then follow the daily Bible readings. In addition study carefully the entire list of references given in your lesson quarterlies, noting particularly the scripture for devotional reading, the primary and the junior topics. The marginal references in your Bible will indicate other texts which should be looked up. It must ever be kept in mind that the Bible is the text-book for study in the Sunday school rather than lesson helps. Take your Bible with you each Sunday.

A God-acknowledging, righteous nation is called for by the Psalmist and Solomon. Paul asks for due respect to the state and those in office. He definitely declares that each citizen has obligations to the nation which must be met. Then he directs attention to the Ten Commandments and shows that obedience to the law of God makes a society where "love worketh no ill to his neighbor." Jesus declared that each citizen was to "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's."

What constitutes a Christian nation is a subject which is often considered. Some insist that the name of Christ or of God must be written into the Constitution of the nation. Some states have done this. The expression of the life and teachings of Christ are surely essential. The Christian Sabbath has been acknowledged again and again by laws and declarations. For example, Sunday is excepted when the President is given ten days in which to act on a bill passed by Congress. It is good to have on our coins "In God we trust," but it is more important to have the principles of the Bible expressed in all of our laws. More and more this is being accomplished.

A REMARKABLE series of articles about the Sunday school has been published in the North American of Philadelphia. These have been reprinted and over a million copies distributed. In the first issue, January 29, 1921, after declaring that the public school is democratic, the editor states: "Equally democratic in ideals, and perhaps more democratic in administration, is the American Sunday school. While the public school makes its fight for democracy by teaching its civic side, the Sunday school implants in the minds of its members a love and understanding of the doctrines of Christ, which are at once the inspiration and guiding principle of democratic civilization. The Sunday school is more democratic than the public school not only in administration, but also in its social side. . . . It is the center of that social contact which unites large numbers of families and individuals, gives them a common interest and inspires in them fidelity to American democracy and Christian civilization."

Home missions as a great subject should be considered in this lesson, even as foreign missions are related to the lesson for next week. The Sunday school and the church are the institutions which do more than all else combined to make the nation Christian. Other forces which make for civic righteousness and Christian ethics get their inspiration from God's Word. The Church rarely comes into existence without the Sunday school as a forerunner, and countless churches exist today because of the prior activities of home missionary work.

Too much credit cannot be given to these pioneer workers who have sought out the unchurched and those untaught in the Bible, and have left the nucleus of a church as they went a-field to still more distant settlers. Write at once to your denominational Board of Home Missions and ask for its last annual report and some leaflets which tell these thrilling stories of conquest. Saturate your mind with this information and give the facts vividly at the lesson hour. Most Home Mission Boards have stereopticon lectures, by means of which the story can be portrayed on the screen. Such a message would be fine in connection with your next Sunday-school social.

A stupendous problem that faces those who are seeking to make the nation Christian is that of the millions of unchurched in our great cities. It is unfair to refer to these only as "foreign population" since there are many "natives" who are unrelated to any church. All, however, must be brought under the influence of the gospel if this, or any nation, is to become Christian. Daily Vacation Bible Schools do much in training the youth for Christian citizenship. The public-school teachers are also doing most resultful service in this matter. The Bible today is in the public school and it must remain there.

MAKING the nation Christian depends upon the individual. Each can be a radiating center of influence until the whole is leavened. It used to be said that the traveler left his religion when he crossed the Mississippi river, and it is told that a home-seeker coming into a new community announced that he would keep the Sabbath holy. He was informed that they did not have any Sunday out there, and he replied, "Yes, we do, for I brought the Sabbath with me." In China a new convert was told she must do her part to make a clean nation. She could not understand that, but concluded that it at least meant that she should keep the street in front of her home clean, so she swept it carefully. Her neighbor noted the contrast and decided to sweep in front of her house, too. The act was contagious and soon the appearance of the entire village was changed. In making our nation Christian each one of us will have some "sweeping" to do right at home.

More Christians are needed in public life. Each Christian, as well as every citizen, has something to "render unto Caesar" in the matter of local politics. The Church can elect whom it will to public office, but too often the Christians fail to give attention till the wrong man is elected, and then they hurry to the hall of legislation and protest against the passage of a proposed bill. The time to be most active is before the election to office. A daily paper recently gave the religious status of the present Cabinet, and all but one indicated a particular denomination. Of those who were elected to the present Congress, comparatively few are out of church relationship.

Obedience to law denotes one as a good citizen. The United States has made a wonderful advance in Christianization by the adoption of the prohibition constitutional amendment. Now, it is the duty of every citizen to obey the law and not seek to annul the law by breaking it.

The state should help and not hinder the Christian, the Church and the Sunday school in their great God-given work, by passing Sabbath laws which will at least prevent the commercialization of that day, and then see that all Sabbath laws are enforced. If the nation is to become Christian, it cannot be accomplished without remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy.

Millions recently gave their lives for a great cause. There is a call now for those who will fight in civil battles to Christianize the nation. Enlist in this Cause for life service under the leadership of Jesus Christ.

dainty little things for invalids. I wonder if I will live to—train more than one set of girls? Maybe I will just live on and on, and see the old ones go and the new ones come, till I'm an old, old woman—and oh, how can I bear it, how can I bear it!"

CHAPTER XI

THE days passed and there was no further word from Mr. Gary. Ruth knew, for the first time in her life, the agony of suspense, even though she busied herself each minute of the day with her household affairs, leaving Ellen Hawtree little to do besides filling the furnace.

She cooked dainty dishes for Nancy Auld until that happy soul begged her to desist—she was growing fatter and fatter, with peace and prosperity and too many good things to eat.

"Just as soon as the house is repaired, Tom and Mary will be married," beamed Nancy, with delight at the prospect. "Honey, if Mary's half as much of a comfort-bringer as you've been to me and to Tom and to that poor writer man, Mr. Blair, she'll be a blessing. What'd you do with your wages—Sary Bryson's wages? That poor child never suspected no more'n a babe, he didn't!"

"I am sure Mary will be a blessing—and I want her to come quickly, for your sake," answered Ruth, hastily, ignoring the question. "The carpenters seem to be getting on nicely—don't you love to watch them?"

Nancy Auld was never to know what became of the wages of David Blair's "chore-woman"; only Ruth knew that, on her visit to town with Miss Emily, she had bought herself a little ring—a cheap ring, but a pretty trifle, set with a little blue enameled forget-me-not. At least she would have that to remind her of him—as if she could forget!

She loved to frequent the spring, now running into a pool surrounded with withered stalks that had once been fair white flags, and green, cheery rushes; soon it would be frozen, when the fierce winter came, and even the little spring would hang in long icicles. Still, the place reminded her of those happy summer days, and poor Ruth would sit on a boulder under the leafless trees, and forget the chilly winds that swept through the bare branches.

AND one day, sitting thus, she heard a rustle in the dead leaves in her path, and looked up to see him!

Ruth thought she knew his face, but now she could hardly recognize the radiant, shining-eyed being who stood before her, his arms outstretched, his lips pleading, "Come!"

Blindly Ruth rose, and fluttered into his embrace, but even as she hid her head on his breast she thought, miserably: "Oh, if he finds out what I have done, will he love me—will he love me still?"

"Listen, sweetheart. Comfort-bringer," he laughed, happily, "to the news I bring. The book is accepted, and I have entered Paradise!"

"It—it was a good book," murmured Ruth, from her hiding place. "David, David, I know it was a good book!"

"Dearest, it was—or they'd never have taken it! Ruth, I ran a risk—an awful risk, in sending it to those big publishers, who hardly ever print anything by an unknown writer; but—well, I felt impelled to do it, somehow. Now lift up your head, my Ruth, and let me have the kiss that I have longed for so long, so hopelessly!"

"David, it was never hopeless," murmured Ruth. "You—you would have it so, and I—was a woman!"

"It is all over now," he laughed, exultingly. "I have the strength, the courage of a lion now! I would make you marry me now, Ruth, even if you refused me! Now let us sit on this boulder and talk—I must tell you about the book, how it came to be accepted."

WITH a strangely sinking heart Ruth sat beside him, while he fumbled in his pocket for a letter—a letter crumpled from much reading, much handling.

"The head of the firm wrote it," exulted David Blair, as he unfolded the crisp sheet, and with Ruth read once more the precious document:

"I tell you frankly," began the letter, after preliminary courtesies, "that if our readers had criticized your manuscript, there might have been small chance for you. Certain circumstances made me read it myself, and I wish to state to you that it is the most original, charmingly written, interesting and I believe, best-selling story I have had the good fortune to come across in many years. I flatter myself that I know—that I have, perhaps, a vision denied to readers, who are apt to judge a manuscript by its writer, too often. I am glad, indeed, that we are to have the pleasure of publishing it. I will also state that we wish another just as soon as it can be written, and can assure you of its acceptance. We would like to make a contract with you to let us have everything you write; our terms will be better than any other firm can offer, be assured of that."

Ruth read this wonderful letter with the fact gradually dawning upon her that the book was accepted on its merits—that her money had had nothing to do with it!

"I failed—oh, I failed—and I am glad, so glad!" she exulted, and the little bird of hope, so long silent, sang once more in her heart, a tune of love, and joy and fulfilment, that would never be stilled again!

BUT her lips remained mute, though her shining eyes told all her joy to the writer, who whispered softly: "And now, dearest, when will you marry the poor writer man, who has become the richest human being under the sun! With you beside me I can write—oh, I can write such books, my Ruth! When will you marry me?"

"When you want me," answered Ruth, and smiled through tear-wet lashes, "when you want me, David!"

And, just then there appeared on the path Ellen Hawtree, leading the way for Mr. Gary, who had just arrived. They were looking for Ruth.

Ellen stopped and beckoned Mr. Gary, who was a bit behind; ecstasy was in the help's simple face, and she hugged her arms with delight, fairly prancing on tiptoe.

"Ain't it beautiful, Mr. Gary?" she whispered. "I never did see folks courtin' before, and I've always wanted to! Miss Ruth's got a beau, Mr. Gary; ain't you glad?"

"Yes," answered Mr. Gary, smiling happily through his Santa-Claus beard, "so very, very glad, Ellen, because she is happy!"

And while these two looked, all unseen, the spirit of the one who loved her best of all, her grandfather Carfax, must also have looked from somewhere in the spaces free to God's souls, and breathed a blessing on his child and her mate. The fulfilment of life, which is Love, had come to her—the comfort-bringer had received her reward!

THE END

A New School for Africa

THE Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church recently has purchased 8,000 acres of farm land in Portuguese West Africa for a demonstration farm and trades school for the natives—bringing the total area acquired by the church in Africa up to more than 25,000 acres at nine points widely separated. The establishment of the farm and trades school forms part of a plan to raise the economic status of the African negroes and was made in accordance with the Centenary program which calls for six such institutions in central Africa. Among trades to be taught in addition to farming, animal husbandry and horticulture, will be carpentry, brick-making, masonry, broom-making and furniture-making. Agricultural experts have been sent out, and a civil engineer has sailed to direct construction and industrial training.

The Peace terms having defined the changes in boundary lines of the countries affected, old atlases, maps, and geographies are now obsolete and useless. All who want to be informed and to be able to discuss intelligently the great changes made on the maps of the world by the war will find it imperative to have a new set of corrected world maps.

Senator Walter E. Edge of New Jersey—
"This is not only interesting but also extremely valuable."

Senator Davis Elkins of West Virginia—
"This Atlas will prove very helpful and instructive to the American people."

There are over 50 new maps in full colors, and corrected according to the Peace terms, and 44 pages of text, giving a splendid and graphic story of the Great War from the assassination of Arch-Duke Francis Ferdinand on June 28, 1914, to the signing of the Peace Terms.

Here's Another Contented Investor—

"Gentlemen:

It is a pleasure for me to mention a word of praise for your peerless service in supplying me with bonds for my surplus funds. I have found you always prompt, courteous and efficient. The properties securing the bonds I have bought of you appear to me to be the best of their kind. The prompt way interest is paid is reassuring.

Recently I desired funds for urgent purposes. When I mentioned this to you I received your letter suggesting that I either sell back to you some of the bonds I had bought of you, or accept a loan from you, using the bonds as collateral.

After giving the matter mature consideration, I decided I did not want to part with such excellent securities, but would accept a loan from you at the same interest the bonds bear. You provided me the funds I needed at a time when accommodation was very much appreciated.

I shall always be glad to assist you in any way I can and to help others avail themselves of your splendid service."

INVEST IN 7% MILLER MORTGAGE BONDS

You will find these bonds a thoroughly safe investment because they are issued only on income-earning non-speculative, fire-proof properties, in prosperous localities. These properties are worth approximately twice, usually more than twice the amount of the bonds issued. An ample Sinking Fund provides that all payments will be made regularly. The supervision of a Trustee is a guarantee of additional safety.

Send today the coupon printed below for interesting booklet—"Creating Good Investments," clearly explaining how well safeguarded and profitable are Miller Mortgage Bonds and how adequately they meet the needs of large and small investors.

come. Frankly, I feel that much must be done by both the missionaries and the companies to bring about the understanding that will mean the support of the work by the wealth which knows the worth of the work.

But there is pride, particularly on the part of the mission boards. As one rather detached observer within the circle of mission work expressed it: "If such a plan with such possibilities is offered, our own churches will finance it; they don't have to go to the oil companies."

That is true, and its statement brings me to the crux of the matter, which is this: The missions may not need oil money to do their work, just as the oil companies may not need the missionaries to do their welfare work for them. But each needs the other for the moral power that it will give; both need one another for the solution of the great Mexican problem, for that problem lies in the hands of these two.

YEARS of observation of the Mexican problem have led me to this conviction: the international difficulties of Mexico are between the Mexican politicians and the American politicians—their interests decidedly conflict. But there is no division of interest between Mexican business men and American business men; the former are as disturbed over the confiscatory policies of the Carranza Constitution (still in effect) as are the latter. Moreover, there is no division of interest between American missionaries and the true social well-wishers amongst the Mexicans.

Then, has it not been wrong of the oil companies (to take them as the outstanding example of great American business in Mexico) to fight on, now that the Great War is over, merely as Americans, hiding behind the State Department and quarreling over technicalities and depending almost alone on the threat of intervention to get them their natural rights as progressive business men? Should they not consider themselves as Mexicans, in a way, and while never relinquishing their rights as Americans, with the flag behind them, deal with the Mexican officials in the way that Mexicans of equal intelligence and equal property would deal with those officials? What a power such an attitude would bring to bear on Mexico and the bandit governments!

The Mexican business man, the one stable factor of the country, has been deserted by his one possible ally, the American and European business man who is operating in Mexico. With that ally behind him, I have a feeling that we might soon be rid of bandit governments.

But where does this bring in the missionaries, you ask? At the very beginning, and carries them clear through. The missionaries know Mexico as well as the old employees of the companies do, and they have, moreover, a closer contact with those great stable forces, the modern Mexican business man and the intellectual Mexican of the middle classes, and they can reach, as the oil and railway companies should know, far into the heart of the labor organizations which have grown up in Mexico as they have looked on. The missionaries can well be the link of the Mexican and foreign elements that must save the situation in the end. As such a link they can indeed be the real saviors of Mexico in her crisis.

AND from the practical viewpoint of the missionary? Only this, that for years the missionary has been fighting, literally, for his place in Mexico. Here and there he has had support from powerful interests—the Y. M. C. A., for instance, first came to Mexico City because the Mexican Central Railway wanted a place where its American employees might be taken care of in the capital. But the Protestants in Mexico are today alone, and with all the money in the world (unless, perchance, they would use that money to buy their way with Mexican graft) they would still be alone. They need help and they need the backing which great, forward-looking industry can give them.

They have done sublime things in the organization of their own forces—at some not far distant day the Cincinnati conference that united all the missions of all Mexico and divided the country up into great zones for intensive tilling will be a landmark in Christian history. Now it seems that they wait only on this next step, the bringing into that same conference-fold the second greatest constructive force of the world—American business. I believe that this can and will be done, and if so, can we not then see the end, the happy end of this long, hideous struggle in Mexico? And in that ending shall we not find the realization of all the ideals that bandit revolutionaries have stolen from the lips of honest, sincere men since the dawning of Madero's ill-fated star?

The Young People's Topics for June 5

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

The Kingdom of God—In the World

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Matt. 6: 7-15

SKETCH a map of the world on a large sheet of paper or on a blackboard. Write across this map the words: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel." This is a command from our Lord and is as imperative as the Ten Commandments. The true Christian is a cosmopolitan. Jesus was not racial, provincial, insular or local. He was a world citizen and His was a world-vision. "Missions," is the key-word for universal brotherhood, peace and good-will. The only remedy for the world's unrest and unreason, without controversy, is the message of Jesus Christ.

It has been said that Christianity has been found wanting. Not so. Christianity has been found difficult. Traditional, emotional, theoretical and experimental Christianity have all been found wanting. The unadulterated Christianity of Jesus Christ when once given its perfect way and sway among men will take the hurt and hindrance, the sting and fang and tooth and claw out of international life. We can not stress "Missions" too much. The words missions and Christianity are synonymous. Every Christian is a missionary and every missionary is a Christian. God had but one Son and He was a missionary. The Gospel includes every-want and dire need of the human race and meets the demand on every hand as a remedy for the sickness of humanity as it is everywhere manifested among the nations.

Thy Kingdom Come—In My Country

E. L. Matt. 6: 7-15

SEE topics for May 1, under head of S. B. Y. P. U., and C. E. Use the following addenda to the exposition previously prepared:

"No other foundation is laid than is laid in Jesus Christ." It is impossible to have a Christian nation composed of un-Christian individuals. Those who are not in the Kingdom are doing just so much to keep their country out of the kingdom. If every individual were in the kingdom of God then our nation would be in the kingdom of God. We may complain about the Godless condition of our country, but unless we are sure that we are not Godless, the fault lies with us.

There are enough men and women, money and influence, brain and brawn power in the Christian Church to make our nation a Christian nation within the next decade. The Christian home is the basis. God at the fireside will create Godliness at the wayside. God in the home will give us God in the school, shop, market-place and in every realm of thought and endeavor.

standing at the center of the clock and looking out to two consecutive numbers on the dial, say two and three. From this clock center the actual work of relief is carried on out into the ten sectors, every village being accurately charted. I am located at one of these centers, a big walled city where there are no foreigners. We are receiving grain daily hauled in mule carts forty or fifty miles from the railroad at Tehchow, and in the court outside this house there are five huge piles of grain covered with matting awaiting distribution. We have a force of from thirty to fifty men at work here daily.

"Who are the suffering ones who are now, or who certainly later on will be, starving? And how shall they be hunted out and distinguished from the many who, while feeling the pinch of poverty at this time, may yet by the sale of other effects they have manage to keep soul and body together until harvest time? With the funds and forces at hand only a fraction of the people can be helped, only those who without other assistance must suffer greatly or die. To find these needy ones and minister to them was the problem that brought into being the operations of which this out-station is a part.

"Standing at this clock center and looking out over our radius of ten miles in the circular field, we must plan to relieve over two hundred villages, each of them containing several hundreds or thousands of famine-pressed people. Out in the country the other day I stopped and counted eighteen such villages on the horizon within the radius of a mile. From the clock center we have been going out into each one of the sectors above noticed, visiting each of the more than two hundred villages, and ascertaining conditions just as they are. This work was already under way, when I arrived. The young missionary who brought me out here and left me in charge of this field told me that foreigners were so few it had been necessary to call on the young Chinese students in Peking and Tsinan to do this work of investigation. I was with them in this investigation work until forced to remain here at the center to see that the machinery for receiving and distributing grain keeps running smoothly.

"IN MAKING the investigation out in the villages, the investigators go in teams of two. A team reaches a village, inquires for the head men or elders in it, requests to be led to only the very poorest homes in the place; and, dividing forces, the investigation starts. They go on a run. Every effort will be made by all the villagers to secure one of the coveted tickets, which means a bare ration of a peck or so of grain each month. Only the very poorest must have them; those who have a donkey or a cow or other wealth must make that, or its sale, serve to support them until harvest. As the doors of each mud or brick house are pushed open the investigator hurries in, glancing first at the faces of the huddled inmates where the pinch of famine is sure to tell; then into each side room in search of signs of hidden animals or other wealth; then into the living-rooms proper, where pots and jars may be holding grain. Everything is searched until the investigation is complete, though often a mere glance at a face is sufficient, and the investigation ends there.

"And what do they see? I saw faces pinched and bearing the tell-tale yellow; skins of dogs telling of recent meals; chaff and fodder mixed with the harvest grain for food; men and women collecting sticks and roots for their next meal. In more than one home I saw, in the jar that ordinarily holds grain, a queer looking substance that once was the bark of trees. A poor shivering woman in one house with the thermometer at freezing was wearing only one thin cotton set of clothes, her others having gone to buy food. Often the house itself had been dismantled of some of its timbers which were then sold to buy bread. And so as each house was entered, almost regularly the people fell upon their knees and begged for the tickets that meant grain for them until harvest.

"A day is set, the announcement is made, and the needy ones come in from a certain sector bringing their tickets and receive their rations for the month. It is fine to see them coming in to receive their grain; they bring their own sacks, pass down the line, and, their tickets having been stamped, receive their rations. A motley throng it is, but their faces tell the relief they feel at this sudden gratuitous solving of their food and life problems. Next month they will come back with their tickets, have them stamped, and receive another month's scant supply, and so on until harvest. With the handful of workers, and the enormous amount of work, there has been no time for anything but distribution; construction work of any kind would require a much larger force, the securing of which out here has been impossible. It is only by unceasing efforts that what is being done is accomplished at all."

ALONG with the tremendous task of feeding the hungry has gone an effort to make the famine victims self-helpful wherever possible. To this end several road-building projects are under way in the different provinces; those who work on the roads being paid in grain, as are the carriers, enough food being given to keep them and their families alive. Not only does this provide improved highways for the future, something China greatly needs, but it keeps the workers themselves in good physical condition for the farm work on which the hope of the provinces depends.

Then, too, schools have been established, schools for boys and for girls, where the children are not only fed but taught. This simplifies the distribution to some extent, and makes it certain that the children are living under more favorable conditions than would be possible in the destitute homes. One of the most interesting points about these schools is that native students of colleges and high schools are aiding so generally in maintaining them, by their contributions and by serving as teachers and helpers.

The famine isn't ended yet by any means. There is a last 5,000,000 who must starve if they are not helped at once by funds from America. All along the way from any city or village in the United States to any famine village in North China a spirit of helpfulness, of self-sacrifice, waits to speed every generous American dollar on its errand of mercy. The Christian Herald money has saved many thousands of lives. It started Chinaward in the Autumn when first the need became known. It has gone steadily ever since. All that has gone has been spent and exists now only in the lives it has saved. But there is still need for more.

Latest official reports from Peking place the number of starving people who are now receiving relief through international committees at 6,945,220. This includes 1,500,000 new famine victims to whom relief has been extended recently.

Through the efforts of the American Committee, the churches and other organizations which have been co-operating with it to provide during "China Famine Week" sufficient funds to care for the last 5,000,000 known to be dependent on new gifts from America, a very large sum has been added to the general fund.

The need is still tremendous, however, and it will therefore be some time before the American Committee ceases its fund-raising. And the Christian Herald, which was the first agency in this country to begin the appeal for the famine sufferers, will continue its co-operation with the Committee to the last.

The Christian Herald fund has reached a total of $550,028.30, truly a gratifying response to China's cry of need and one in which every member of the great Family Circle may take pride. In view of the alarming news from Minister Crane in Peking regarding the failure of the spring crop in Chihli, involving the necessity of caring for two million persons for several months longer than had been anticipated, the Christian Herald will continue to receive contributions, which may be addressed to the Christian Herald Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

Questions and Answers

R. M. B., Salemburg, N. C. The passage in John 14: 12 ("Greater works shall he do," etc.) referred to the miraculous gifts which were to be the credentials of the apostolic office, and the "works" which they were to accomplish were to be greater in the sense that they would produce a multitudinous ingathering of souls—after His ascension or, as Jesus Himself explained it, "because I go to my Father." He foresaw those results and cheered His disciples with the picture, strengthening their faith with the assurance "From henceforth thou shalt catch me." To get the full extent of the consolations He set forth, we must read the rest of the chapter, for it is a complete series of encouragements and remarkable promises, viz: the gift of prevailing prayer, the assurance of accomplishing great works and making many converts, and the promise of sending the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, to teach them wisdom and constantly recall Christ to their remembrance.

Mrs. E. C., Okla. 1. The question you suggest is too extensive to be discussed in the Mail-Bag. See the passages bearing on the Sabbath in New Testament times: Mark 2: 27, 28; Luke 6: 5, 9 and others. 2. The ten commandments in substance are referred to in various New Testament passages. The person who obeys Jesus Christ is not absolved of the ancient law, but he comes under higher obligations. Under the old law, murder was forbidden; but Jesus forbade the anger that leads to murder. He came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it, and this He did by setting His followers free from its age-old restrictions, and placing them under the greater obligation of love for all men, and inculcating a higher morality and more generous consideration in their attitude toward the whole human race.

A. C. H., Polk City, Iowa, writes: "I have taken the Christian Herald for about forty years. We were very much pleased with your editorial on 'False Guides.' I am sure you will rejoice with us in the birth of the Iowa Bible Association on Christian Fundamentals." Enclosed, our Iowa friend sends an outline of the Bible Association's object and its doctrinal statement. The new organization believes its existence justified by the fact that "in these days many are denying the divinity of Jesus Christ, and the efficacy of the Atonement, and that consequently false doctrines are taught in many schools, colleges and seminaries, and the time has come when God is calling His children to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints." The leading officers of the new organization, which has its headquarters in Polk City, are the pastors of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Evangelical Swedish Missionary and the Congregational churches.

Mrs. A. E. D., Jordan Valley, Oreg. We are told to avoid even "the appearance of evil," which means not merely that we will not do evil things ourselves, but we should not encourage others to do them.

J. A. B., St. Paul, Minn. To judge of a man's attitude toward Christ and Christianity without having heard him, and with only a hearsay knowledge of his views, would be altogether wrong. A faithful preacher of Christianity teaches full acceptance of the divinity of Jesus. His finished work, His offer of salvation to all who believe, His sacrificial death, His resurrection and ascension. A preacher true to the Christian religion and to his ordination vows can not dispense with any of these without inflicting vital loss upon his ministry, and causing earnest Christians to question his soundness.

A. H., Lewisville, Tex. There is a moral obligation on both debtor and creditor. The former should clear his conscience and square the account by paying all that is properly due to the creditor, interest included. Zaccheus said he "restored fourfold." There is also a moral obligation on the creditor's part to make the burden of restitution as light as possible, especially if the debtor's means are limited and if complete liquidation, interest included, would prove a real hardship. Both sides need to be considerate, each toward the other, instead of following the legalistic spirit, which would exact payment "to the uttermost farthing."

Rev. A. C. P., Athens, Wis., writes: "We got into a discussion in our little town about raising the Flag over our Public School on Washington's birthday. The master of the Boy Scouts, also the principal of the High School said there was a law passed in 1916 in Wisconsin not to have the flag out in stormy weather. Is there such a law?"

Your county officials or any good lawyer can inform you if there is such a law on the statute books. If it should be found there, it is quite likely that it has been passed out of respect for the flag. We have seen fine flags torn into shreds in a sharp gale, which might easily have been saved, had they been furlled at the beginning of the storm.

A. J. B., Johnstown, Pa., writes: "The Mail-Bag is very helpful to me and gives me constant reassurance that there are yet a few living that have not bowed their knees to Baal. I have been especially interested in the discussion of amusements. One thing seems certain regarding this question. That is this: it is the carnal mind that demands carnal amusements. The more the Church caters to worldly amusements for the purpose of holding the young, the worse the disease becomes. Young converts will seek to be engaged in spiritual things. Anyone may know whether they are Christians or not by their 'center of conversation.' In our own experience, we have seen many times churches that kept the altars burning. While the Church was engaged in saving souls there were no cook-stove fires burning. I have observed recently that these same churches that kept up the spiritual fires years ago, where souls were saved, where prayer-meetings were full of holy fervor, now have ice-cream freezers by the door, hot fires in the cook-stove in the basement of the church; the conversation of the people is about oyster-soups, lemonade, bake-sales, ice-cream suppers and social functions. The center of their conversation used to be about Christ and His Kingdom. But now the old preacher is gone; the prayer-meeting is almost gone; the class-meeting is neglected. We have tried the oratory of the Sunday sermon and the mid-week sermonette, the church movie—the soups and salves of five hundred brands of modern theology. Now for our soul's sake, let us turn back to Pentecost and seek the true and living way to God (Acts 3: 19). Let us sincerely turn from feasting to fasting; from full heads to full hearts; from waiting on tables to waiting on God; from ham, sham, and chicken-filling, to the infilling of the Holy Ghost. Turn from the pulpit the polished infidels who mutilate the Holy Book; then the amusements of the world will not be desired in the Church."

Mrs. J. B. R., St. Stephens, Ala., writes: "The Christian Herald is growing more excellent each year. We realize fully the power it is wielding for God's plans to help save the world. A principal theme, I think, should be our influence and the training of the young people and the very young children. The home, I believe, is the real seat of God's Kingdom, also of the government of our nation. I am the mother of thirteen grown sons and daughters, and speak from experience. Each one, was taught to kneel at my knee and say the little prayer which has always led to deeper, and also to higher visions and realizations of duty to God, to parents, to mankind and self. While none of them are long-faced Christians, each and every one is in homes of their own. All are men and women of fine, good business ability and influence. Their letters show that they never let up for a moment living the Golden Rule. If each little being coming into the world could have the same tiny spark kindled in its mind and heart, what would be the result? All have their ups and downs, passions and faults; but deep down in their hearts is that basic principle: they cannot live without the love and fear of God in their hearts and homes. They never will grow too old for me to admonish them to live with Him constantly and to be alive to the working of His Spirit. All this is my life. I believe the home is the main story."

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 15.

To invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6 1/2 per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107 1/2 per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent. are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7 1/2 per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co., 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Record of Investments Chart—a simple chart for listing your securities which shows at a glance your monthly and annual income, together with necessary information on Federal Taxes—Ask for Circular 39.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par yielding high average yield of 12 1/2%—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 42.

Barnsdall Corporation, 7 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold bonds to yield about 9 per cent. own and operate properties in 14 States. Total net assets 377 per cent. of this issue. Circular 40.

Circular 41 gives full information concerning a 7 per cent First and Refunding Mortgage Bond yielding about 8 per cent. 1920 earnings amounted to more than twice the annual interest charges on all underlying bonds including this issue.

The least thing you can do for your country is to show its flag

Let your neighbors know that yours is an American home. Stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights and let the flag proclaim your alliance! Here is the very flag you want—a large sized "Old Glory," six feet long by four feet wide, a flag which will add dignity and beauty to your home.

To Honor the Flag These Rules Should Be Observed

It should not be hoisted before sunrise nor allowed to remain up after sunset.

At "retreat," sunset, civilian spectators should stand at "attention" and uncover during the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner." Military spectators are required by regulation to stand at "attention" and give the military salute.

When the national colors are passing on parade, or in review, the spectator should, if walking, halt, and if sitting, arise and stand at attention and uncover.

When the flag is flown at half staff as a sign of mourning it should be hoisted to full staff at the conclusion of the funeral.

In placing the flag at half staff, it should first be hoisted to the top of the staff and then lowered to position, and preliminary to lowering from half staff it should be first raised to the top.

On Memorial Day, May 30, the flag should fly at half staff from sunrise to noon, and full staff from noon to sunset.

How You May Secure This American Flag

We will send the Christian Herald, the World's best loved and most widely read interdenominational family magazine, for one whole year, 52 issues and the flag postpaid for Three Dollars

Wouldn't you like to own a large American Flag like the one shown in this picture if you could get it for almost nothing?

Not a little hand flag, understand, but a man-size "Old Glory," 6 feet long by 4 feet wide.

Not a pitiful wisp of color, mind you, but real red, white and blue, right from the factory of the flagmaker.

Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism. You will not only have use for a flag on every holiday for many years to come, but you can also use it constantly for decorative purposes, in public and private sociables, in the school-house, in the church, and, best of all, in the home.

At this time of the year The Christian Herald

Speed with Safety

THE fastest working soap that can be made, yet harmless to clothes and in all general cleaning—that's P AND G The White Naphtha Soap. It combines speed and safety as they never were combined before.

This soap saves hours in the laundry, in the kitchen, and all over the house because it has within itself the dirt-moving energy which your own hands and arms must supply slowly and painfully when using ordinary soap. It is so efficient that it washes clothes without rubbing, and without boiling if you so desire; cuts grease and soot from dishes and utensils almost at a touch; and does all the weekly cleaning in an unbelievably short time.

Yet it does not injure anything it touches because its cleansing power is due—not to destructive chemicals—but to naphtha and to its high grade materials of which whiteness is the outer sign.

You can't imagine how much this soap will save you; and without taking any toll from the things it cleans. But get a cake and you will know why millions of women have used it continuously since their very first trial.

The turn of a river, a railroad bridge or the scattered houses of a town along the course serve as guideposts for the air mail pilot as he roars along far aloft on his route

The Post Riders of the Sky

Adventure Rides with the Mails Today as It Did in Frontier Times, When Indians and Bandits Lurked on the Trails

By DONALD MacGREGOR

BUCKING, bolting, vibrating against the wind the mighty mail airplane is pushing along at a hundred miles an hour. Below, the countryside is slipping past serenely.

The mail pilot, young and adventurous, in fur-lined flying-suit, close-fitting headgear and goggles, sits quietly with his hands on the steering wheel. He is chewing at a wad of gum—for gum causes him to swallow frequently and swallowing takes away a part of the ringing of the ears that comes from the deafening pounding of the motor and the whirl of the propeller.

Subconsciously he watches the two tiny dials in front of him, one indicating the air speed and the other the altitude. It is second nature for him to turn the wheel to right or left to keep the course or balance and to raise or lower the wheel-shaft—the "stick," it is called—to gain or to drop to a new elevation.

The altitude is 2,500 feet, virtually half a mile above the ground, the character of which is distinctly visible. Everything looks flat. From such a height, say 2,500 or 3,000 feet, all sense of proportion with respect to hills and valleys is lost.

There is nothing to keep away the sunshine. The air is cold. The trees, with their leafy tops particularly when they are numerous, as in a woods, seem as though they would be comfortable to fall into—fully as inviting as a grassy nook along a stream in springtime. The red brick house in the distance looks much like a chimney does from the ground. It is possible to follow the twists and turns of yellow country roads and of grayish streams for many miles. The cultivated fields, some green, some brown, are neat little squares as if on a giant checkerboard.

IT IS lonely enough with nobody around to talk with. As a rule the postal flyers go alone on their routes, but occasionally there is a passenger or two—there is room for them in some of the larger machines. It may not be realized generally, but there can be no conversation between those who ride in the usual type of airplanes. Sometimes it is possible to convey an idea by forcing the voice tremendously or by lip signals but the roar of the mechanism and the rush of the wind is too great for anything more.

The turn of a river, a railroad bridge or the scattered houses of a town along the course serve as the guideposts. The route is charted much the same as the roads for automobile tourists.

The airplane is rushing along in an uneven way. The conflicting currents of air are causing the bolting of the heavy machine, its everlasting shaking as if in an angry mood. The wind snaps against the spreading planes and sings through the steel rods that hold them in place.

Close behind the pilot, who is sitting in a line with the motor, is the cargo of mail—400 pounds of it, in pouches strapped into the pit of the airplane. It has been put aboard at the flying field from a motor truck sent out by the postoffice; there will be another post-office motor truck at the landing-field ready to hurry back with the flood of letters so they may be sent out on the late afternoon delivery.

The airplane is sent to a higher level, to 3,000 and then to 3,500 feet. The conditions are no better there, so the craft drops back slowly to 2,000. The track is shifted until a minimum of resistance is encountered. Airplanes operate in a cube, not on a single plane as do land vehicles.

The pilot gazes over the side of the pit into which he is strapped. He wishes to get his bearings, to see something directly below.

The rush of wind on his face, exposed, almost blows his goggles away. He ducks back behind the glass windshield again, a windshield much the same as that on an automobile.

Before him in the pit and at the side is a network of levers and gauges—various controls which become necessary to adjust occasionally to keep the airplane going. It is work, grim but romantic—and important.

ADVENTURE rides with the United States mails today just as it did many years ago, when it went astride a wiry pony that poked its nose past the fringe of civilization. Death lurks nearby just as it did when robbers and murderous Indians infested the lonely roads of the frontier. The means of transporting the mails have changed, but not the chances.

There used to be plenty of romance in the days when the mails were carried on horseback. The towns were far apart and the riders went alone, with the mail in pouches swung across the saddle. There were many post-rider murders, from ambush, in the early days.

Then, as the country grew, the mail stage took the place of the man on horseback. The robberies became more business-like, for the road agents of the early West traveled in gangs and had a system in their holdups that was lacking in the solitary bandits of previous years.

Gradually the stages yielded to the ever-forward progress of two lines of steel across the country, the rails over which traveled the early trains. Even today the heavy mail-cars fall victim to masked bandits, whose six-shooters seldom fail the mark.

There always has been romance, adventure, peril, in the carrying of the mails—continuously shifting in character, of course, as the means of transportation has advanced—but it reaches a climax with the establishment of the airplane mail.

TODAY the post rider braves the air-currents in all sorts of weather. He chooses not only the clear, sunshiny days to get the mail through, but travels day in and day out, over a definite course, whether it be cloudy or bright, winter or summer.

Up through the clouds—perhaps they are sending down rain or snow—he drives the airplane with its load of letters, working on a schedule adjusted to meet the requirements of sending and receiving postoffices. He picks his route from a book containing a charted course. The performance is routine.

Point-to-point flying is the rule in the Air Mail Service. Once the airplane is on its way there is no deviation from the course. The gigantic machines are built to carry weight, and not for stunting. It simply is a case of getting into the air, getting to destination and getting down again, on one of the landing-fields.

Occasionally there is trouble, perhaps with the motor, and the airplane is forced to make a landing away from one of the regular fields. In such an instance an open field is selected, one that contains no trees, and the mail plane is brought to the ground for adjustment.

Forced landings are not so infrequent as they are astonishing to the countryfolk in whose backyards they are accomplished. They are encouraged by the postal authorities when necessary, since the failure of the pilots to recognize impossible conditions for a continued flight has been responsible for a goodly percentage of the accidents recorded.

Twenty-six men have been killed in the Air Mail Service up to date. This occurred in a total of twenty airplane crashes, not fewer than fifteen of which resulted from the fact that the pilots attempted to continue their runs despite bad weather conditions, such as fogs. They simply lost their way in the sky, together with all sense of balance, crashing, finally, into a tree or a mountain. It is surmise, of course, based on a later survey of the circumstances, but the authorities believe these accidents might have been avoided had the pilots accepted the weather as temporarily impassable instead of going ahead in the notorious dare-devil way of the average man who flies.

In the various crashes death came to eighteen pilots, four mechanics, one division superintendent, and a civilian employee who was out for a joy ride. On two occasions mechanics fell into the swiftly moving propellers while the airplanes were being tuned up for flying.

The development of aircraft, which is continuous, is taking away many of the perils of flying. Every accident is studied for the lessons it will teach and, as a result, the Air Mail Service is rapidly standardizing its types of airplanes. Ships capable of carrying heavy loads of mail, designed solely for straight flying, with the planes so fixed that if something goes wrong the craft will drift down to the ground, constitute the ideal for which the engineers are striving.

THE Air Mail Service has expanded gradually since its establishment in May, 1918, adding a few additional miles to the routes and a few additional airplanes to the equipment whenever possible, but it has remained until this present spring for the realization of the dream of those who put it into operation—the dream of an airplane postal service from coast to coast.

New York City, therefore, for the written word is but thirty-six hours away from San Francisco, despite the fact that the customary running time for trains is five full days and nights. The accomplishment of such rapid transmission of letters will go down in history as an achievement of first importance to the people of the country.

This pace is possible by means of night flying between Cheyenne, Wyo., and Chicago, Ill., an air distance of 800 miles. The first step in the journey, from San Francisco to Cheyenne, over the Rockies, is made in the daylight, when flying conditions are at their best; so is the jump from Chicago to New York City. The level country between Cheyenne and Chicago, across the great plains, permits with a minimum of danger the negotiation of this 800 miles during the night.

The flying distance between New York City and San Francisco is 2,630 miles, this route alone embracing all but 825 miles of the total for the Air Mail Service. There are three other routes—between New York City and Washington, a flying distance of 195 miles; between St. Louis and Chicago, 270 miles; and between Chicago and the Twin Cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul, 360 miles.

In reckoning the time of flight between New York City and San Francisco an allowance is necessary for the three-hour difference in time as registered on the clocks of the two cities. The winds count, too, for there is, naturally, a continuous current from the Pacific toward the Atlantic.

In flying East from San Francisco the pilots have an advantage in the prevailing winds and a handicap of three hours added time, but those sailing toward the setting sun have an advantage in the time and a disadvantage in the wind. It is, in a way, a check and a balance; the advantages and disadvantages make the scale about even.

THE Air Mail Service started out largely as an experiment with a route between New York City and Washington. From this modest beginning it has expanded to a system which embraces 3,455 miles, dotting which there are twenty-three landing fields.

In all there are sixty-five airplanes in active service, with 155 more, drawn from the war stocks of the army and navy, held in reserve for future use. There are fifty-four pilots and 562 other employees, such as mechanics, helpers and clerks. Roughly, the service costs a million and a half dollars a year to operate, payable out of the postal revenues.

The new administration intends to expand rather than to reduce the service. Specific evidence of this is the institution of a special radio service for the use of the mail flyers. The major stations already are in operation at Washington, D. C.; Bellefonte, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo., and Omaha, Neb. Fifteen minor stations are about to be opened. The officials intend to install radio telephone apparatus aboard the airplanes so that they will be able to communicate with the various stations and with each other while they are in flight.

A group of mail airplanes lined up, awaiting their cargoes of letters

As viewed by the Postoffice Department the practical advantages of the Air Mail Service come through the speed in the delivery of letters, even over short distances. The officials estimate that there is a general saving of at least half the time in the transmission of letters by air post.

Altogether the Air Mail Service is operated under an elaborate system, carefully worked out on an intricate schedule. While the primary aim is to deliver mail between the points in the service, yet in many instances it is possible to carry letters merely to connecting trains, thus spreading the saving of time to towns and cities not actually on the routes. For instance, a letter from a small town in New York State to a small town in Illinois may go to New York City by train, to Chicago by air mail, and then to its destination by train.

such as newspapers, magazines and merchandise, is handled much more cheaply. It is worked over, as a rule, in the postoffices where there is adequate room and then loaded into the cars, up to the roof, if desired, for shipment straight through to destination.

The rapid transmission of letters by air permits this working of mail in the postoffices without any noticeable loss of time. This does away, of course, with a large number of the distributing cars and permits at the same time, a more complete distribution than ordinarily is possible aboard a train.

AT PRESENT approximately 224,000 letters are carried each day by airplane mail. The average load of an airplane is 400 pounds. Since letters average forty to the pound, it is estimated that each load consists of 16,000 letters. The system provides, for the carrying in different sections of the country, of fourteen loads a day.

Airplane pilots in the mail service receive $2,000 a year salary and five cents a mile for the distance flown, so that a regular pilot receives from $3,000 to $6,000 a year. The average is about $4,000. Each pilot flies four days a week, approximately 1,600 miles.

"The flyers in the Air Mail Service have to be twice as proficient as those in the military service," in the opinion of C. J. Stanton superintendent of operations of the service. "They go out under all sorts of weather conditions, winter and summer. The mail flyers cannot select their days. Their job is always before them—that of getting the mail to destination."

"The loss of life in the army and navy flying services is greater than in the postal service. I am basing this on point-to-point flying, and not on stunting, such as is done in the military service, which runs the figure up."

Postmaster General Will H. Hays is working out a scheme of co-operation between the Air Mail Service of the Postoffice Department and the Army Aviation Service, under the War Department to further the national preparedness of the nation. Mr. Hays has interested himself in the service to such an extent that he has made some flights in postal airplanes on his own account in the vicinity of Washington and on the route between Washington and New York City.

Mr. Hays wants to create an aviation reserve corps through the Air Mail Service for the purpose of giving practical training to flyers who might be of value to the country in time of an emergency. The scheme has the approval of some of the high officers of the army, and of John W. Weeks, Secretary of War.

"In this way the Air Mail Service can be one of the greatest value to the country," Mr. Hays declares. "Aviators can be trained to fly and then to get their practice in carrying the mail. Large numbers of young men can be kept prepared so that in the event of a war they can be summoned to serve in the army."

"Purposeless flying, therefore, such as now is necessary in the different aviation schools throughout the country, will come to an end. It will result, I am sure, to the best interests of the commercial as well as the military requirements of the nation."

The reliability of the service was shown by the recent award of prizes by five newspapers along the transcontinental route to air mail pilots flying between New York City and San Francisco. The awards were based on mileage on completed trips made at the rate of eighty miles an hour or better, and failure because of weather conditions or motor trouble was discounted. The winner of the first prize of $500, William C. Hopson, made 111 trips for a total mileage of 23,778 during the six months of the contest; his closest rival made 103 trips for 22,651 miles; and the third man flew 21,240 miles on 102 trips. These performances were achieved as part of the routine of the Air Mail Service and it is interesting to note that each of the prize winners was in the Army Air Service during the war.

Loading the San Francisco mail aboard a postal airplane at Mincola, L. I., just outside New York City. If all goes well the journey from the Atlantic to the Pacific will be completed within thirty-six hours

Such criticism as has been levelled at the Air Mail Service in and out of Congress has been to a large extent on account of the cost. The truth is that it is an expensive service, yet the postal authorities insist that this is offset largely by a saving through the consequent curtailment in the number of railroad distributing cars. This saving, they figure, is eighty per cent. of the cost of the Air Mail Service.

Distributing cars obviously are an expensive feature of the postal service. These are the cars in which the mail is sorted while in transit. They carry from two to four clerks who, of course, must have adequate space in which to work. This reduces the carrying capacity of the distributing cars.

On the other hand the second- and third-class mail,

The Business Man in the Church

How He Could Make Its Work Immeasurably More Effective

By FREDERICK A. AGAR

(National Efficiency Secretary, Northern Baptist Convention)

IN THE average community in America a large percentage of the successful dominating business and professional men are to be found in the membership of the local churches. Those business men in the church generally hold a majority of the offices in the local organization. They are the deacons, elders, stewards, trustees, treasurers and Bible school superintendents of the church they belong to.

For many years the various local churches have been absolutely dominated in official places by these men and yet it is quite true that the worst managed institutions in American life have been those same church organizations in the control of those leading men, in their respective communities. It is true that many of them do sooner or later fail in their business enterprise, but if they had conducted their week-day business affairs as they have conducted their local church concerns, they would have failed much sooner and in many cases been dishonored. This fact has been stated to many groups of men and never been contradicted. Of course, there are exceptions to this rule.

The church that is blamed and often despised in the world around it, is in reality causing a condemnation of each of us, for it is but the product of our own and our mothers', fathers', brothers', sisters', companions' and friends' life and labor. We need therefore to stop resenting the flood of criticism and look the facts squarely in the face and then act with common sense to remove quickly the real causes for ridicule and criticism. Too often in the past the stark naked facts have not been told because, forsooth, some are fearful that the Christian sentiment of the country would be outraged and the cause of the church damaged. It is damaged far more by the policy of silence because such a policy precludes the hope of a constructive change.

MEMBERSHIP values at present are calculated in numbers and not in character and achievement when judged by the condition and progress of the local church. One such organization recently dropped nine hundred names for cause. In general, local churches drop about half as many each year as they add by profession of faith. This is poor business. Quality is always above quantity.

The membership, to the extent of about half its number, do not patronize or work for their own institution. It is not uncommon to find a church where only half the members are worshipping with regularity, serving with any adequate zeal and giving in proportion to their evident ability. No business institution could survive this experience for any length of time.

The church apparently does not believe enough in itself and its message to spend adequate sums of money in advertising what it has to promulgate. The progress of business depends upon proper advertising. The average free newspaper comment on religious happenings is not a fair index of what is transpiring in church circles.

For instance some weeks ago in a minister's conference we were discussing the deeper needs for spiritual ministry in the face of present world conditions. In answer to a question from the floor the leader of the conference made a single reference to a much discussed pleasure by advising that time be not wasted in preaching against it, but to build into the life of the church a positive program of activities and the thing referred to would soon be minimized. The presence of a reporter had not been noted, but to the chagrin of the speaker this one little question and answer had been put into a glaring headline and anyone reading that newspaper would have had good reason to think that for several hours that conference of ministers had discussed a sensational phase of amusement while the world about was in great spiritual distress and need.

The business man in the church is in a position to secure proper treatment for church news and he should see that in the local press distortion and gross misrepresentation should cease. Newspaper men like ministers are human and they want to give their constituency what is demanded. Newspapers are most generous toward the churches and have sincerely endeavored to help them, but have lacked co-operation from the business man in the local organization. The church must pay for its advertising like other lines of business.

The church is run on a cheap basis and maintains one of the lowest average wage scales of any organization in the land. It pays its leadership an average wage of less than $800.00 per year. Cheap or poorly paid help is most costly in the long run, for it produces failure in every direction. An underpaid ministry is one of those strange revelations concerning the unreality of Christianity and its detachment from daily living with many business people.

The church in the city or large town is receiving a steady stream of people from the rural or village church. But the average city or large town church permits one of its chief sources of addition to remain in a notoriously backward and weak condition. Moreover, the country church furnishes a large percentage of the ministerial candidates. Who will dare say that those young men are not more or less permanently affected by their early religious conditions? Good business men in commercial circles keep their eyes on the sources of supply.

Many a local church has sold its birthright for a mess of pottage, known as ease in Zion, which results in a minimum investment of lay time, energy, talent and personality. Churches today often hire a preacher to do the work of the organization and then the members, like a group of baseball fans, have sat on the side-lines and hollered at the worker. The average church is the product of its membership and in general today ministers are more or less the product of the people they serve; only they are a little bit higher up than the average lay member. Many local churches are composed of a lot of unrelated groups of people called Bible Schools, Women's Unions, Young People's Societies, Men's Brotherhoods and so on.

The objectives of these varied groups are seldom correlated, so that they all may help to produce a unified goal. Often they are distinctly competitive of each other, particularly in regard to the production of money. They have no common treasury under church control but each maintains its own financial officers who lead their group in efforts to exploit for money everyone within reach. Recently one such local church reported twenty-three money-producing agencies within its sphere of activity. All this money exploitation leads to endless confusion and loss and often produces methods that are distinctly lawless and destructive. Fancy a mercantile establishment with twenty-three departments, each having its own financial plans and officers? Such a condition would not be possible in the business realm nor should it be possible in any local church wherein are some successful business men. One unified financial plan and appeal to every member should produce the total needs of a well-built, all-inclusive budget.

IT IS Dr. Agar's business to travel from end to end of the country, meeting calls from churches to be put on an efficient basis—a basis that makes for efficiency in its particular business, which is the spread of the Gospel and the advancement of Christ's Kingdom on earth. He has learned many things, some good and some bad, about the conduct of the churches' affairs, and he approaches their problems with a deep sympathy and full understanding of their difficulties. Sometimes his conclusions may be resented and his cures disliked, but he has a big record of ill churches made well that warrants close attention to anything he says.

The tendency of the local church has been to desert down-town and other difficult sections of a congested city and move out of such needy centers instead of holding on and investing money enough in a worthwhile program to insure success in serving needy peoples. Too often the church property does not compare with the business property of the community, for it has been generally built on a basis of minimum expenditure and immediacy.

Business that is catering to the public for commercial profits is constantly investing larger and larger sums of money to keep in the center of life and action but the church under the direction of business men has followed the opposite policy.

ANOTHER tendency of the past two decades has been to build auditoriums to seat audiences, rather than a building that while accommodating a congregation would provide ample space for a well-rounded teaching and training ministry to every phase of normal life. In consequence thousands of barn-like structures dot the land.

Due to improper financing the church property has been utilized but a short time each week, thereby rendering partially useless the property investment. This is contrary to good business sense. The buildings are often needed for good community service but are made unavailable because of a misuse of the terms sacred and secular.

Common standards of integrity and responsibility often are not maintained in church life as they are observed in commercial transactions. As instances of this, we may cite the hushing up of the failure of some members to pay their pledges for church work, while they meet every other obligation; failure to emphasize the duties which church membership entails; the giving of letters of dismission which state that the individual is in good report or regular standing when the truth is far different; resort to money-raising schemes which conflict with the church's acceptance of tax-exemption as an institution devoted solely to the service of mankind; the temporary diversion of missionary contributions to meet local expenses; and delay in the distribution of various funds which come in from week to week, while the organizations for which they are intended are forced to borrow to meet their bills. In many minds a question will have come during the reading of these statements. It is an old question in church circles and has been answered in the wrong way for many many decades and the divine institution has in consequence suffered grievously. The question is this—"Why make this public? Why not keep it quiet and correct it, but do not put the church to shame." But after those decades of "keeping it quiet," it is found that the church is not less troubled by low standards than it used to be. Good business and true Christianity demand that the business men in the church shall pull their spiritual heads out of the sand and look conditions in the face and put the concerns of the church on the highest spiritual and business basis. There is nothing wrong with the divine institution, but the fault is with the business men who control the organization on a low plane while they have a higher code of efficiency and ethics for their commercial pursuits.

The ministry are not entirely blameless in all these matters and will willingly and sorrowfully accept their share of the responsibility and if the business men will free the ministry from financial dependence upon the good-will of a capricious people, they will soon have much larger opportunities to relieve the church from its present situation.

NOW that we have confronted the disagreeable part of the discussion let us remember the constructive values of a local church to business life.

In the far West when frontier surroundings were common, conditions were very bad and women and children were not very prevalent until a church was organized and a little building was erected. That church, often weak and poverty-stricken, was a decided asset to the business life of the community. It helped to stabilize commercial life. It increased property values and safeguarded them. The credit of the community was enlarged. It grew in population and culture and the whole atmosphere was changed for the better along moral and social lines. What was true in early days in the far West is also true today anywhere in America. Who is there that would want to live in a place where the Christian Church was not established?

In central Africa, where my missionary life was lived, commercial life followed in the wake of the missionary. We led the way and created the needed conditions and then business grew apace. The organized church has been and is one of the great safeguards of business enterprise all over the world. It has also helped very largely, through its gospel, to make and keep on the up-grade those fundamental principles upon which all good business is founded and safeguarded. Keen successful business men everywhere recognize their need of the church. When, therefore, condemnation and rejection is poured upon the church it must be remembered that it is not the institution, divinely projected, that merits the contempt but it is those who use their talents, energy, foresight and acumen for selfish ends and being members of the church fail to use those same elements for the production of worth-while results in that organization.

Perhaps some reader may be unable to separate the divine institution from the personnel of its followers. Baseball is a great game, worthy of the nation that has made it the national pastime, and no one surely would confound the game itself with the little group of wretched men who used the game as a vehicle for their own dishonesty. The game is good but those men are bad. So is the divine institution good, but too often its membership is inefficient and unloving.

FINALLY, let us consider what relation the business man in the church should have to its future operation.

Being Christian in his business life, he will be business-like in his church. The same acumen, talents, sagacity, foresight, integrity, tenacity, strength of purpose, property sense and investment values will be shown in every phase of his life and in consequence the church will come into its proper high place in the world of people.

Ogden, the Detached

The Story of a Baby in Business

By IDA J. BURGESS

Illustrated by Agnes C. Lehman

The baby, all rosy and smiling and smelling deliciously of orris, was handed over to his impatient father

THORNGATE'S habit of talking over his business with his wife dated back to the days when his affairs were insignificant and his personal acquaintance with the income tax was wholly negligible. He could not recall that she had ever made a really definite nor valuable suggestion, yet he was forced to admit that there were times when her intuition was uncanny, though the deductions she drew were usually laughable, as for instance, in the case of Ballinger. All she had said at the time was that Ballinger had the wrong kind of curly hair and sang tenor! Of course, in the face of such absurd criticism, Thorngate took him on, but, as he dismally recalled, Ballinger had been a distinct failure.

Now as he lifted his coffee-cup and smiled at his wife across the dinner-table, appreciating dumbly the effect of the soft candle light on the delicate tints of her skin and the premature silver of her hair, he continued the subject under discussion.

"Ogden is a fine fellow—clever, forceful and all that—but he would never do to handle our men. He's too detached—too impersonal—too lacking in the human touch. Now wouldn't you think," Thorngate put down his cup with emphasis, "that a man with a two-year-old baby would open up a bit on the subject when he's given a chance?"

"A baby! Have the Ogdens a baby?" queried Mrs. Thorngate with new interest. "Why didn't you tell me before? You know"—her lips quivered slightly.

"But I didn't know! That"—Thorngate's smile was tender but there was a touch of exasperation in his voice—"that is just the point I'm making. Ogden didn't even tell me when the baby came, though he has been with us five years. I don't suppose I would know about its existence now if I hadn't run across him buying a little red wagon like the one—" it was the man's lips that twitched now, but he swallowed hard and went on. "He couldn't very well avoid me then, you see; not when I asked him point-blank what orphan he was buying it for. But don't you see that a man who holds himself so aloof isn't the sort who can enter into the lives of three hundred other men, as the man who holds that job will have to do in order to be a success. I don't want a fellow talking about his personal affairs in business hours, but there are plenty of other times when you sort of expect these younger chaps to open up to a fatherly old fellow like myself. No sir! That place of shop manager needs a man with plenty of points of human contact, and Ogden falls down right there."

"But," argued Mrs. Thorngate, "after all, only a real father would buy a red wagon and carry it home himself!"

"Well, he acted as if I had caught him robbing the safe," rejoined her husband crisply. "All I could get out of him was that he had a baby about two years old—a boy. And he only told me that because I dragged it out of him. I tell you he's too chilly a proposition for the place. He could handle figures, but not men."

He rose to pull out his wife's chair. As they passed into their cheerful living-room, Mrs. Thorngate slipped her arm through his and rubbed her cheek against his sleeve.

"You can't expect all men to feel as you did, Dick," she said softly. "Let me try to find out about Mr. Ogden. We'll ask them both to dinner Sunday and tell them to bring the baby. Then you will have a chance to judge at first hand."

SO IT happened that a day or two later Douglas Ogden carried home a note from Mrs. Thorngate to his wife. He carried it home, but it was quite two hours later before he thought to deliver it. For there was a period in the daily routine of his life when Ogden's thoughts were centered upon just one object. Tonight, as usual, he hurried away from the dingy suburban station, arrived, breathless with haste, before his home and ran up the steps with the air of one who fears to be late for some important event. He turned his key in the lock with the furtive skill of a housebreaker and let himself softly into the warm hall. Through the glass door that led into the living-room he saw again for the hundredth time the picture, the memory of which hastened his homeward steps, and for the perfect vision of which he moved so quietly.

In a low rocking-chair drawn close to the fire, sat Marion, a capacious white apron over her pretty blue gown. By her side stood a lace-trimmed and beribboned toilet-basket, and on a low rack hung a baby's nightgown warming in the glow of the flames. There was an appetizing smell of dinner cooking somewhere in the background and a tall lamp shed a rosy radiance on the simple furnishings of the room. But the whole scene to Ogden's eyes was merely the appropriate and usual setting for the wonderful being who sat on his mother's lap, crowing with joy and radiating superb health. At the click of the key in the lock, Marion glanced at the clock on the mantel and gave the baby a little poke in his ribs, thereby ensuring a still wider grin of welcome for the person who was arriving.

"Right on time, isn't he, honeybunch?" she whispered into the baby's ear. "And if he should happen to be late we could set back the clock and he'd think you were going to bed on schedule time, and yet he wouldn't miss his frolic. What's a schedule for, snookums?"

Dropping his hat and overcoat in the hall, rubbing his hands to make sure that the least bit of chill should have disappeared from them, his face aglow with eagerness, Douglas—the cold, detached, impersonal aspirant for the place of shop manager in the Thorngate plant—hurried in to take his part in the evening ceremony of the Ogden household. There was always the same routine to be observed—a routine of which none of the three participants ever seemed to weary. First there was a sweet young mother to be very fondly kissed. Then a gurgling two-year-old was swung to his father's shoulders for a sight-seeing expedition about the room which included a solemn greeting for every picture on the walls. This Douglas called a "high art pilgrimage," and declared it was laying the very foundation stone of a human being's proper education.

Then came all the fascinating details of a baby's nightly toilet, shamelessly deferred past the prescribed hour by an otherwise systematic mother. There was the exciting moment when a little shirt would stick fast to a round fuzzy head and in wild endeavor to escape from the confining folds its owner unwarily exposed a fat pink stomach to a masculine finger that beat a tattoo on the place where some ribs should have been, though no eye could discern them. Baby chuckled and escaped from his tormentor by the simple expedient of turning over on that portion of his anatomy whereupon there was a delectable fat back to be rubbed and ten pink toes to be counted.

"And this little pig cried 'wee-wee-wee' all the way home," chanted Douglas joyously.

"Wee-wee-wee," squealed his son.

"You're a pair of silly geese," declared the third of the trio, "and Daddy Boy is the sillier of the two. I'm ashamed of you," whereupon she was consoled by a rapturous hug.

THEN the warm nightgown was slipped over the adorable charms, and the baby, all rosy and smiling and smelling deliciously of orris, was handed over to his impatient father while his mother went to prepare her son's supper. This was the time that Douglas loved best of all—the incomparable bliss of the quarter of an hour when he held his boy in his arms and crooned the lullaby he had heard his own mother sing. Only a young father knows the dreams a man dreams when he sits before an open fire with his first-born son in his arms.

It was not until the baby was tucked away for the night and two flushed but radiant young parents faced each other across the dinner-table that Douglas remembered the note. Marion opened it wonderingly.

"Dear Mrs. Ogden," she read. "Will you and your husband dine with us very informally on Sunday at half past one. It's a very unfashionable hour, I know, but we want you to bring the baby. We will send a closed car for you and we hope that nothing will prevent you from giving us the great pleasure of your company. Yours cordially, Helen Thorngate."

"The baby! How did Mrs. Thorngate know we had a baby?" asked Marion. "I thought you said you had never mentioned Junior at the shop. And I have never seen Mrs. Thorngate since he was born."

"I never have spoken of him," protested Douglas. "You know if there is anything that makes me tired it is a man who is always gushing about his kids. You bet, I don't talk about him. We agreed before he was born that we'd never talk about our children in public no matter what sort they turned out to be. They were to be our children and were not to be discussed nor inflicted on our friends. I've stood for enough of that sort of stuff in my time to be guilty of indulging in the pastime myself. Of course, I've never mentioned the baby at the shop."

"But how"—began Marion.

"Well," Douglas was distinctly peevish. "I ran into the old man when I was buying that red wagon the other day. Couldn't dodge his questions. He seemed mighty interested for a man as old as he is. Started to ask me all sorts of things, and I had to cut and run or he'd have had the whole history of the baby."

"Oh, then he must have gone home and told his wife," said Marion. "That's why she invited the baby. Now what are we going to do about it?"

DOUGLAS scowled. "We'll have to go. I've got an idea Thorngate wants to look me over for that job of shop manager I told you about. Probably wants a squint at you, too. But what he wants the baby for is beyond me. Well, we'll go, but we'll have to behave—you especially. No gushing over the baby for Thorngate, remember."

"But Douglas," protested Marion, "you are quite as silly over Junior as I am and you know perfectly well that no matter where we are if he is there too we can't help being a little foolish over him."

"Then he'll have to stay at home," decided the other foolish parent. "If we haven't any more self-control where our child is concerned, then we aren't going to appear in public with him until we get it! We'll throw a bluff about him getting sick—a cold or a stomach ache or a new tooth or something of the sort. He'll be perfectly safe with Susan for a few hours and the Thorngates won't know he isn't coming until we arrive without him. Besides, they only asked him to be polite. What would a cold proposition like Thorngate want with a baby? Other people aren't as foolish as we are."

"But we've never left him alone except at night after he is sound asleep," Marion was disturbed at the mere idea of such desertion. "I'm afraid I'll be so worried that I'll show it."

"Nonsense," snapped Douglas. "There's got to be an end to this sort of thing sometime and it might as well be now. Other people have children and manage to leave them at home."

"Yes," said Marion, doubtfully. "But Junior is so different!"

Whereupon Douglas laughed and pulled her ears. "You'll have to buck up, old girl. It's a question of landing that job. Old Thorngate isn't going to stand for nonsense. I've got to show him I'm above small affairs—"

"Small affairs!" retorted Marion indignantly, which ended the discussion for the time.

THE Thorngates still dined at midday on Sunday. It was one of the customs of their early married life, carried over from the time when Helen Thorngate had cooked the dinner herself and Richard had sat down to it in his Sunday suit, with hands which, in spite of prolonged scrubbing with sand soap, still showed traces of his work at the bench. There had been a baby then—a rollicking two-year-old who had died just about the time that his young father's long hours of toil were rewarded by the discovery on which the subsequent Thorngate fortune was built. The dollars had come, but there had been no more babies, and Helen Thorngate's maturing beauty had taken on an appealing wistfulness, and beneath Richard Thorngate's appreciation of his hard-won success there lurked always a suspicion of its futility when there was no son who could carry on the name.

The Sunday that the Ogdens were expected, Mrs. Thorngate paid special attention to the menu.

"No fancy dishes today, Mary," she said to the privileged person who had ruled the kitchen for many years. "I know you love to make them, but I want an old-fashioned dinner—fritassee of chicken with lots of cream gravy and mashed potatoes and some nice jelly and sponge cake and plain ice cream—the sort of things a baby could have a taste of if babies today are like—" she broke off abruptly.

Mary looked at her mistress with the understanding eyes of a common womanhood. "Sure, ma'am, and I'll be after ordering some certified milk and cooking a cereal if it should be that they'd not be letting him have the other things."

Mrs. Thorngate nodded. She could not trust herself to speak. It had been so many years since she had planned a baby's meal!

Thorngate looked up from his reading as his wife sought him out in his favorite corner of the sun parlor. "Dick," she bent over to him to whisper in his ears, "will you bring the high chair down from the attic? I'll go with you to dust it off."

"Why not call a maid?" her husband started to say, but catching a glimpse of his wife's face he rose instantly. Why, to be sure, no one's hands but his or hers might touch so sacred a thing.

From a locked storeroom at the top of the big house they brought it down—a cheap, battered wooden high chair, the varnish of its tray marred by the white rings where a baby's cup had often been placed, its footrest dented by the kicking of restless little feet. They brought it down the wide stairs and placed it amid the massive carved mahogany of the beautiful dining-room. It had matched the yellow oak set with which the Thorngates had started housekeeping, but here it stood out in sharp contrast—incongruous, pathetic, a mute, but eloquent symbol of something dear and sacred. Helen dusted its scarred surfaces with a trembling hand, while Thorngate laid his arm across her shoulders. But neither spoke as they turned back to the sun room to await their guests.

BUT when the Ogdens came, they came alone. "Didn't you—didn't you bring the baby?" Even Mrs. Thorngate's perfect courtesy was not proof against such disappointment.

"Oh," said Marion, as if the thought of her child's absence had but just occurred to her. "He wasn't well and we decided at the last moment not to bring him. Besides," with an air of extreme nonchalance, "children are so troublesome."

"Quite so—quite so," put in Douglas in his most perfectly aloof manner. "Have you been following the developments in the Irwin case, sir," he turned to Thorngate as if to dismiss such trivial subjects from the masculine ken.

"No," said his employer brusquely. "Say"—this to Marion—"the baby isn't very sick, is he?"

Marion flushed. "Oh, no," she said in quick denial. "he's never sick. I mean he isn't very sick. And we have a good person to leave him with."

"Good person!" Thorngate glanced at his wife. He knew that she was telling herself that there was only one "good person" for a sick baby and that was the baby's mother. What had come over this newer generation of parents?

Talk at the dinner-table dragged. The plain meal which was to have symbolized those never-to-be-forgotten years, suddenly, was merely plain food from which all savor had departed. The battered high chair that was to have enthroned a royal guest stood mute and empty in the corner where it had been thrust hastily. Doggedly, Thorngate stuck at his task of drawing out the Ogdens on the subject of their baby.

"Has your boy any teeth?" he asked Marion. "Don't they have a whole mouthful at his age?"

Marion brightened visibly. Here was something worth discussing. "Yes, indeed," she responded promptly. "He's cut nineteen and there's only one more to come, you know. And he did it so easily. Why, his first tooth came when he was only four months old and we never knew a thing about it until Douglas found—" here she caught a glimpse of her husband's frowning face and stopped short. Gushing about the baby as usual. And on such a topic to such a man! She floundered about miserably,

When You Climb the Hill

I DREAMED a curious dream one night, a long time ago. And the memory of it has stayed with me through the years. It's stayed with me so strongly that once I wrote a poem about it—and once I used it as the background for a story. And today, because of Mary Harris—of whom I will say more, later—it came back to me again.

The dream, as I said, was a strange one. But it was a simple one, as to construction. It seemed that I was climbing up a steep hill—a long, dusty, tiresome hill. And it seemed that upon the sides of the hill—away from the dust and dirt—there bloomed green little gardens and sweet, cool stretches of lawn. And it seemed that pleasant people called to me from those garden spots, saying:

"Wait a bit—wait! You're going by all the good things of life! You're missing the flowers and the sunshine and the love. You're letting your youth slip away."

I heard them calling, in my dream. But I didn't answer. For they seemed hardly important enough to answer. Only I kept saying to myself:

"They're silly, asking me to stop. They should realize that I must hurry to the top of the hill. That I must hurry!"

The way grew rougher, as I climbed. I could feel the heat of the sun on my uncovered head, and I could feel the bite of sharp stones through my slippers. There were ledges of rock to be crawled over, and deep ruts in the path. But still I kept on. And as I went up and up the green garden places began to grow smaller and the smooth bits of lawn fell sharply away. And the voices of the calling people became only murmurs in the distance.

I toiled on. And then, suddenly, I began to grow weary. And all at once I thought, with keen longing, of the garden spots that I had passed.

"IT WOULD have been nice," I told myself, "to have lingered with the pleasant people down below. But—" I added, "I'm almost at the top. And when I've reached the top I'll have nothing more to do, for the rest of my life, but enjoy gardens! I can always go back to the place I've passed!"

So I said, in my dream. And, because of my philosophy, I gritted my teeth and struggled on, up the hill that was now almost unbearably steep. I could feel blisters on my heels, and my head ached, and my tired back was a torment. But I struggled on—and on. And at last I reached the brow of the hill—a gaunt barren spot.

I was tired, so tired, when I reached my destination that I sank down upon the ground. I was too exhausted to feel even a slight degree of triumph. But at last I raised my head wearily and looked about.

Don't Go So Hurriedly That You Miss All of the Garden Places!

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Yes, I was at the summit—I had reached the heights that I had toiled for. But everything seemed drab and colorless and shrunken—on the heights. And all at once I wanted the gardens that I had passed so carelessly. And I glanced eagerly down the hillside. But all that I could see was the hard road, winding dustily into the distance. For the garden spots had disappeared—as though some gigantic hand had erased them.

All alone on the summit of the hill I sat. And the sky was dark above me, and I was worn out, and there were no gardens to go back to.

And suddenly, I waked from my dream. And my cheeks were wet with tears.

WHEN Mary Harris came to see me, today, in my office, I noticed the great change in her. When I first met her, many years ago, I had been a child and she had been a young and radiant woman. And somehow, ever since our initial meeting, I had connected her very name with thoughts of youth and radiance. So the change in her came as a real shock to me.

She was faded, and dull, and gray. She was undeniably old, although she was only a little past forty. And her whole manner was disinterested, listless.

We talked, for a while, of the commonplaces. She had been the friend of older members of my family—we mentioned them. And then, as conversation drifts, we swung around to her work (for she is a very successful business woman) and to mine.

"You've gone ahead so fast, Miss Harris," I ventured. "You've reached the big things sooner than most people."

Mary Harris laughed, a hard little laugh. "Yes," she said. "I've reached the big things—at forty-one. But I almost wish that I hadn't gotten to the top so soon. Don't—" suddenly her voice was intense, passionate, "don't make my mistake!"

I, somehow, did not want to ask questions. But my curiosity got the better of my delicacy.

"What mistakes have you made?" I asked.

And Mary Harris told me

It was a commonplace story that she told me, rather. And the dull tone of her voice made it even more commonplace. There were no high spots in the narrative, no moments of climax.

AS a girl she had been absorbed with the idea of carving out a future, a career, for herself. She had been obsessed with the thought of doing something worth-while, something big. She had talked of it, dreamed of it, prayed about it. And at last a business opportunity, with possibilities, had presented itself.

She had seized the opportunity. And she had thrown herself into the work. She had given up her play times, her moments of recreation, her friends. She had made the business her master—she had become a slave to it.

It is not strange that she made good. You see, she was putting her very life into it. Amazingly she forged ahead, from one position to another, until she had reached an executive office with her name, in gold leaf, upon the door. And then, for the first time, she felt that she could rest.

There had been times, during her progress up the hill of business, when she had almost hesitated. Mary Harris told me, in her monotonous voice, of a man who had wanted to marry her; and she had loved him. There had been a home in the country that she had contemplated buying. There had been a certain course of study that she had pondered on, and a trip to Europe, and a chance to do good in the crowded slums. But they would have interfered with her progress.

"They would have held me back," said Mary Harris, "and I didn't want to be held back. So I gave them up. But now—" her voice broke, "now that I've time the opportunities are gone. The man married another girl. And some one else is living in the house. And I'm too old to go to college; I'd be miserable in a class with just young women! And I can't interest the slum kiddies—all I know is business, and they don't care for business! Oh," she was almost sobbing, "don't try to get ahead so fast that you'll miss all the joy of life!"

IN MY dream the garden places and the pleasant people had disappeared. In the life of Mary Harris—and in many another life—the garden places disappear just as suddenly, completely!

Of course every one wants to be a success. Every one wants to climb to the top of the hill! But the wise climber will pause in climbing—will take time to enjoy the garden places; to see God's flowers, and God's green grass—and to know the love that God has put on earth for us.

The wise climber will get to the top of the hill, eventually. And he'll have a real joy of achievement when he gets there.

For there will be warm memories in his heart of garden spots, and youth, and an unwasted spring-time!

The Family Altar Again

THE number of letters received in reply to the editorial on The Family Altar has been very large, and the letters which have come from homes in every part of the country reveal the gratifying fact that the custom of family worship is by no means gone out of the nation's life. The Christian Herald wishes again to acknowledge all these letters, with hearty thanks for the great care and time taken by many writers in describing the way in which they observe the habit, and in many cases outlining in detail the exact form of service held.

The present seems to be peculiarly a fit time to revive this subject. The tremendous upheavals which are going on all over the world in its political, social, economic and industrial life are calling attention to the basic need of the right kind of home and family influence. Already our divorces are almost as many as those of Japan. Family life and integrity are threatened by the hotel and apartment existence forced on thousands. Strikes and lockouts in all parts of the world are creating a spirit of bitterness and unrest that destroy the peace and equanimity of households. The scarcity of candidates for the ministry is illustrated in the remarkable and alarming fact that colleges which a few years ago graduated a score of candidates for the ministry are now graduating only one or two. If ever a consecrated and praying family life were needed in this nation it is needed now as never before in our history. And the establishment of a Family Altar with its immense influence in shaping ideals and creating spiritual impulses is imperative, if we are going to have in the future such homes as will save a republic.

Along with the gratifying revelation of such homes already established, testifying to the tremendous value of the custom in shaping character of children, it is also of great interest to note that splendid organizations like the Gideons, through their speakers who have the courtesy of the churches extended to them, are in very many cases emphasizing with power, the need of the Family Altar. At a recent gathering of the Gideons in the Middle West one of the speakers was so effective that as a result more than forty families in one parish decided to establish the altar in their homes. No one will ever be able to measure the value of those decisions in that parish and community.

Ministers of the Gospel, may we be allowed to make this suggestion? In making your parish calls, what greater service can you render your people than to talk over this matter of the Family Altar with your parishioners? When you receive new members into your communions, what finer thing can you do than to urge the custom on all who have made their vows to love the Lord Jesus Christ. And what greater sermon can you preach than one in which you take the Family Altar as a theme, and outline a simple form of conducting it, giving for illustration of its power, the testimony, gathered beforehand, of all those in your parish who have put it into their homes as a regular part of the sacred home circle. If the Family Altar were an established fact in every American home, we would not be afraid of anything in our social, industrial and political life. Without it, we are in danger of losing out of the Home, which is the real power of the state, the one greatest factor which can shape and mold its thought and conduct.

The Value of Bible Study

IT IS a fact well attested that among the greatest minds this nation has produced, there are comparatively few who have not drawn their principal inspiration from the Bible. Lincoln had studied it from boyhood and its influence was reflected in many ways in his later career. It gave to his addresses a forceful eloquence which caused them to be remembered. McKinley and Roosevelt also owed much of their best qualities in public life to the fact that they studied the Word. And now President Harding, in a recent letter approving the work of a Chicago Bible distributing organization, wrote of the value of Bible study in these unqualified words:

"I have always believed in the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, whereby they have become the expression to men of the word and will of God. I believe that from every point of view the study of the Bible is one of the most worthy to which men may devote themselves, and that in proportion as they know and understand it, their lives and actions will be better."

It would be interesting to know to what extent the members of our present Congress have studied the Bible, and in what measure it has been a spur to their eloquence with both voice and pen, and a counselor in times of emergency. The public man who has never studied the Bible has missed much that would have contributed to the real success of his career, while he who has drunk deep at its springs of wisdom, finds it applicable to every emergency, and is not ashamed to tell the world how much he is debtor to it for the greatest triumphs that have come to him in the battle of life.

That Bible study is much more popular today than formerly, we think can not be questioned. There are great multitudes, even outside of Bible schools and classes, who find God's Word a source of comfort and blessing, a safe Guide through all the vicissitudes of life, a revelation of Divine love and forgiveness, with assurance of the life to come.

Commercializing the Lord's Day

WE HEARTILY commend the spirit of the veto message sent to the Connecticut Legislature by Governor Lake, in which he sets forth his reasons for returning, unsigned and unapproved, the measure entitled "An Act Concerning the Observance of Sunday." The Governor's veto says:

"If this bill becomes a law, the entering wedge of the last session would be confirmed and established as precedent for a commercialized Sunday, and there would be no justification in refusing to authorize any commercial activity upon Sunday. As Governor Holcomb has said, time alone would be required to practically remove all legal distinction between the Sabbath and the secular days of the week. I sincerely and strongly believe that this movement is one of the greatest menaces to the stability of the Nation. History has taught us this lesson, whether we are willing to accept its teachings or not. The pressure of modern liberalizing tendencies in the observance of Sunday has done very much to break down the universal respect for the Christian Sabbath, and it appears that the last line of defense is to be upon the question of commercialism."

"This bill sanctions the capitalization of the sport of baseball and football for the chief benefit of the organizers and promoters of professional baseball games, and the disclosures of the last year have revealed clearly the commercialism which has crept into the latter professional sport."

"The General Assembly of 1913 first saw fit, in spite of Governor Holcomb's disapproval, to authorize commercialized amusements on Sundays. I believe that they erred in what was for the best good of the State of Connecticut and her future peace, prosperity and comfort; that neither that action nor this proposed Act is in accord with those traditions and regulations of life which, coming to us from our ancestors, have made us proud of these New England States and of Connecticut's place among them. In my opinion, the majority of the people of the State are of this belief."

That the growing tendency of what has been called the "liberalizing movement" is towards the wiping out of the Lord's Day altogether, as the Governor points out in his message, will hardly be questioned. The Connecticut liberalizers may pass the measure over the veto; but Governor Lake will have the consciousness that he has done his duty, as a faithful Executive, in opposing the commercialization of the Sabbath. His appeal to history and the lessons it holds is a timely warning, and although it may not prevail, it surely ought not to pass unheeded.

Better or Worse?

IN REPLY to the question raised as to whether this generation of young people is better or worse than the generation a quarter of a century ago, a large number of replies have been received. A majority of these replies say that this generation is different in many ways from that of twenty-five years ago, because it is surrounded by more things to amuse and distract from the serious side of life. In other words, a large number of things have come into this generation which spell expense, and tempt to excitement of the senses.

A quarter of a century ago, there were no movies. Today, the young people crowd the amusement places day and night. By count in one town of 50,000 people, in one afternoon over 700 school children were found in five different movies. The night attendance of students from High School was over 1,200. Draw your own conclusion.

Twenty-five years ago there were no school and college dances and social functions on the large scale as today. At present it is the exceptional college that does not have at least two or three dances a week, and social functions on the part of the fraternities and sororities that take hours of the students' time and much of his and her money. Or, perhaps to be more exact, the money of "father." Draw your own conclusion.

A quarter of a century ago, the fraternities and sororities in colleges were not organized on the scale they are now. In one large educational institution in this country there are 42 different Greek letter societies. Most of these are purely social organizations. They have no literary program. Many of them are extremely expensive. They did not engage the attention of the average student twenty-five years ago as they do today. Draw your own conclusion.

The expense of getting an education has more than doubled within a quarter of a century. The editor went through the Academy and the University on an average expenditure of less than $400 a year for six years. Today it is the exception when a college student gets through a year without spending $1000.

Before any one can answer intelligently the question whether this generation of young people is any better than the generation which has passed, a large number of factors must be taken into account. It remains to be noted that there is no doubt the present-day student has MORE THINGS in his life than students had twenty-five years ago. Do you think those things have made him better or worse? Draw your own conclusion.

Who Is Gandhi?

THE Great British Empire, with its 400,000,000 subjects on whom the sun never sets, knows very well to its present anxiety who Gandhi is, but the average American citizen, even the one who reads the daily paper most carefully, would not know whether the unusual name spelled a new kind of automobile or a special brand of breakfast food.

Gandhi is the leader of the mighty non-co operation movement in India, and his followers number more than any human being ever had in any country. And the wonder of it all is that this frail human being, who weighs only 100 pounds and is a strict vegetarian, fasting for long days, is a practical politician, not a wild visionary nor an impractical dreamer. Gandhi has a definite program to make India a national government, ruled and conducted in all its political, economic, and educational and religious life by the native Indian people. To bring this great program to pass he advocates the complete boycott of everything British in the way of manufactured goods. He preaches the duty of every native of India now in the British employ as a government servant, to resign, and great numbers of high-salaried officials among the educated young Hindus have voluntarily given up their positions to follow the Mahatma, or "saint," who is looked upon with intense reverence by millions.

Gandhi is a pacifist and advocates no use of force to advance the revolution. He says the appeal must be made to the soul of man, and that militarism of the western nations is blasphemy against God. He has very practical ideas about the way in which the people can establish industries of their own. To the wonder of the religious world, Gandhi has succeeded in attaching to himself as his special lieutenants two Mohammedans, and has actually brought the Hindus and Mahomedans together in his crusade against everything British. This feat alone marks him as a unique figure in the revolution of Indian thought and action.

Gandhi goes barefooted, travels always third-class, and is a believer in the oneness of humanity. He preaches against caste, and the use of titles. Hundreds of young Hindus have turned back to the British Government distinguished medals and titles conferred upon them, and thousands have embraced Gandhi's creed of no caste.

It is said by the missionaries who have met him that enormous crowds follow him and listen to him and after Gandhi's preaching, the crowds rush up to kiss his garments.

Just what will be the historical outcome of this man's antagonism to the great British Empire's rule in India remains to be seen. At present the statement is being made that never in all mankind's struggle for independence has any human being had such an enormous and enthusiastic following as Mahatma Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi.

The C. E. Convention

AT LEAST 50,000 people are expected to attend the World's Christian Endeavor Convention which meets in New York on July 6. Several times that many people will be vitally interested in the activities and personalities of the convention. As a complement to the great young people's organization the Christian Herald for July 9 will be a special Christian Endeavor number, with a portrait of Dr. Francis E. Clark, its founder and president, in colors on the front cover. If you are a member of the Christian Endeavor, or you have friends who are members, you will want to order some extra copies of this unusual issue. If you do want additional copies for your friends it would be well if you ordered them now.

The World News of the Week

Secretary Hughes Rejects Polish Appeal for America's Support

AMERICA'S intention to stand aloof from the settlement of the Silesian controversy has been reaffirmed in a note from Secretary Hughes to the Polish Minister in Washington, who had sought to enlist American support for Poland's claims. Prince Lubomirski, in a lengthy communication, had accused Germany of cruelly oppressing the million Poles in Upper Silesia, assailed the provision which permitted Germans born in Silesia to return for the plebiscite, and denied Germany's contention that she must retain the province in order to be able to pay indemnities, in an endeavor to persuade the American Government to instruct its representatives abroad to exert their influence in Poland's behalf.

Secretary Hughes's reply, which followed his habit of stating America's views briefly and concisely, declared that the settlement of such boundary disputes was a matter of European concern in which the United States, in accord with its traditional policy, should not become involved. It added that the American representatives in the Allied councils, as far as could be foreseen, would express no opinion regarding the settlement.

The differences between Premiers Lloyd George and Briand regarding the situation created by the Polish invasion of Upper Silesia have not been settled as yet, but they are to meet soon for a face-to-face discussion which it is hoped will bring an agreement. The vigorous attacks on Lloyd George's criticisms of Polish policy by the French editors evoked from the Premier a statement that their tendency to resent as impertinence any expressions not in accord with their views "if persisted in, will be fatal to any entente." Regarding Poland he added: "The fate of Upper Silesia must be decided by the Supreme Council, and not by Korfanty. The children of the Treaty cannot be allowed to break crockery in Europe with impunity. Somebody must place a restraining hand on them; otherwise there will be continual trouble."

Harvey Repudiates League

COL. GEORGE HARVEY'S first address as Ambassador to Great Britain contained the most positive declaration yet made by any high American official regarding American participation in the League of Nations—a declaration so emphatic as to remove the last vestiges of doubt as to the attitude of the Harding administration unless the new Ambassador spoke without authority. And it is hardly conceivable that Colonel Harvey, delivering a formal address to an assemblage which included Premier Lloyd George and many of the highest British officials, would make such an utterance without having submitted it to the President for approval.

"There still seems to linger in the minds of many here, as, indeed, of a few at home, the impression that in some way or other, by hook or by crook, unwittingly and surely unwillingly, the United States may be beguiled into the League of Nations," he said. "Now let me show you how utterly absurd any such notion is. I need not recall the long contest waged between the two branches of our government over this proposal. . . . Finally, as you know, the question of America's participation in the League came before the people and the people decided against it by a majority of 7,000,000 out of a total vote of 25,000,000. . . . Anybody could see that it follows then inevitably and irresistibly that our present government could not without betrayal of its creators and masters, and will not, I can assure you, have anything whatsoever to do with the League or with any commission or committee appointed by it or responsible to it, directly or indirectly, openly or furtively. . . . I need hardly add that my government would not dream of criticizing, much less of objecting, to the League as now constituted of other nations. I wish only to dispose definitely and finally of the strangely prevalent and utterly baseless supposition respecting the attitude of the United States of America."

In his speech Colonel Harvey interpolated an announcement that he had just received instructions from President Harding to represent the United States at any meeting of the Allied Supreme Council to consider the employees was the fact that several railroads were re-employing men who had been idle for some time.

Presbyterian Assemblies Meet

THE General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. and of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. have been holding their annual sessions, the Northern Church at Winona Lake, Ind., and the Southern at St. Louis, with the proposed constitution for the union of the Presbyterian and Reformed churches as one of the most important matters to be considered. This plan embraces also the Reformed Church in America, the Reformed Church in the United States and the United Presbyterian Church; and the united churches would function through a biennial assembly to be known as the United Assembly of the Presbyterian Reformed Churches in America. Each constituent church would retain its autonomy in the creed, government and worship but would act "to further the redemptive work of Christ" through the United Assembly.

The Northern Assembly elected Rev. Dr. Samuel Chapman Swearingen, of St. Paul, Minn., to succeed Rev. Dr. Samuel C. Palmer, of Columbus, Ohio, as moderator. Dr. Swearingen received 560 of the 875 votes cast, the only other candidate being Rev. Dr. John B. Laird, of Philadelphia. Rev. Dr. A. B. Curry, of Memphis, was chosen moderator of the Southern Assembly, succeeding Rev. Walter L. Lingle, of Richmond.

The election of a successor to the late Rev. Dr. William Henry Roberts, of Philadelphia, as stated clerk, was deferred by the Northern Assembly, and Rev. Dr. James M. Hubbert will serve for a year.

Chief Justice White Dies

EDWARD DOUGLAS WHITE, since 1910 Chief Justice of the United State Supreme Court, died in Washington at the age of seventy-six as the result of complications following an operation which had been too long postponed. For several months the Chief Justice had been in poor health, and four months ago his physicians and friends urged him to give up his work on the Bench to prepare himself for the operation, but he declared his duties were so all-important that if necessary he would rather die than stop for treatment.

Chief Justice White's career illustrated the rapidity with which the bitterness of Civil War days passed; for the man on whom was bestowed the highest judicial honor in the nation's gift had served as a boy in his teens in a Confederate regiment from his native state of Louisiana. After twelve years on the Supreme Bench of Louisiana he was elected to the United States Senate in 1891 and served in that body with distinction until he was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court in 1894. His promotion to the first place in the court was remarkable as the first instance in which a President had chosen a Chief Justice from the opposing political party.

Several weeks ago there were rumors that Mr. White intended to retire on account of poor health and that William Howard Taft would be appointed to succeed him. It was Mr. Taft who made him Chief Justice, and Mr. White was said to be anxious to see the former President at the head of the Supreme Court, which was his ambition before he became Colonel Roosevelt's choice for the Presidency. Charles Evans Hughes also was mentioned for Chief Justice, but it was believed the need for him as Secretary of State would prevent his nomination.

Franklin K. Lane Dies

A FEW hours before the death of Chief Justice White, there passed away another distinguished American—Franklin K. Lane, who served for seven years as Secretary of the Interior.

THE 16-INCH GUNS OF AMERICA'S NEWEST GIANT FIGHTING CRAFT

One glance at these huge weapons on the super-dreadnought Tennessee, which has just passed her trials, is sufficient to explain why the naval armament race has grown so costly as to be a tremendous burden to any nation the Silesian situation. In Paris it was suggested he might serve as peace-maker.

Railway Wages to Be Cut

THE United States Railway Labor Board has decided that there must be a general reduction of the wages of railroad employees, but has not determined how deep a cut in the pay of the workers is justified by present conditions. Announcement of that decision was promised for June 1, and the new scales are to be effective on July 1. The employees of about ninety railroads, among them some of the largest in the country, will be affected by the decision, which will set the standard for all future decisions and ultimately fix the wages of the entire 2,000,000 railroad workers in the United States.

The bulk of the employees who will come under the initial decision are in the unskilled class, mostly maintenance-of-way men, but the request of two companies for wage reductions of all classes affords an opportunity to set a precedent all along the line. As a preliminary to the readjustment, the Board announced a new and complete occupational classification of all railroad labor which is to be used as a basis for the settlement of future disputes.

Representatives of the employees began at once to arrange for an appeal to the courts in case the wage reductions should be larger than they consider just. An order would be sought restraining the railroads from making the reductions effective until the appeal had been adjudged by the courts—a process which might involve months of delay. It was believed that the board's authority would not be questioned but that precedents would be cited for a court review of the board's findings. The exact powers and status of the board have been regarded as doubtful by some, and the law creating it provided no penalty for a violation of its decisions.

False Shame

A Sermon by REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT—II Tim. 1:8. "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner."

BE NOT thou therefore ashamed." Here the healthy ministry has been perverted! The instinct of shame was implanted by God to help to control and restrain the rising rebellions of meanness and sin. Healthy shame is a certain refined sensitiveness guarding the soul from even distant approaches of the unworthy. Therefore healthy shame is a minister of good. "Is not shame," says Thomas Carlyle, "the soul of all virtues, of all good manners, of all good morals?" But the soil has been soured, the instinct has been perverted, and now in many lives shame is a snare and a source of temptation rather than a minister of good. We are ashamed at the wrong place, and at the wrong time, and about the wrong thing.

Our shame is the foe of holiness instead of the enemy of sin. Instead of being ashamed of the devil we are ashamed of our Lord. "False shame is the parent of many crimes." It is against this perilous shame that the Apostle warns his young disciple, "Be thou not ashamed of the testimony of the Lord."

How does this perversion take place? John Bunyan makes the pilgrim, Faithful, encounter False Shame in the Valley of Humiliation. Humiliation made him ashamed. In the house of the Interpreter, amid goodly companions, and the recipient of honor and esteem, Faithful had no inclination to shame. But when worldly esteem was taken away from him, and he lost his earthly dignities and crowns, his face flushed with humiliation, and he was secretly ashamed. False shame is the creation of unworthy fears. Let me just recall some of the fears in which this shame is born.

There is the fear of appearing odd. Men are humiliated to find themselves standing alone. In the convivial throng they do not like to hold aloof from the general practice. They participate in the things they know to be unworthy lest they should be placed in solitary isolation. No man likes to be a "wet blanket"; no one covets the office of being "a skeleton at the feast." "In Rome, you must do as Rome does"; that is the principle given to us by our fellow-guests. To stand apart is to seem eccentric, and for fear of the crowd we become "ashamed of the testimony of our Lord."

THERE is the fear of appearing unmanly. A tender conscience seems effeminate. It appears to be so much more masculine to enjoy the rough laughter of the world than to sensitively recoil from it. Silence may be interpreted as weakness. It is told of Sir Robert Peel that at the height of his political power, he was one night out at dinner. The ladies had left the table, and the conversation was directed in channels that were both unworthy and unclean. Sir Robert Peel rose from the table, his face suffused with the signs of healthy shame, and immediately left the room. Sure there is no effeminacy in this silent and terrific rebuke! Yet the majority of men would probably have participated in the coarse laughter, or by approving smiles have encouraged its continuance. They would have been ashamed to stand out lest their manliness should be questioned and despised. They would have been "ashamed of the testimony of our Lord."

There is the fear of appearing inconsistent.

It is not an easy thing to confess that we were wrong. The world makes such a confession terribly difficult. The world regards confession as humiliation, and its phraseology is descriptive of this regard. The world speaks of "bringing a man to his knees" and making him "eat his own words." And therefore the majority of men will not confess their mistakes; they will rather oppose the truth and adhere to "what they said." They will preserve their consistency at the expense of their self-respect.

There is a very counterfeit type of consistency which greatly needs to be exposed. It was never more abounding than in our own day. Consistency too frequently means changelessness of opinion and changelessness of speech. But that is not the true consistency. I am not consistent because the opinions I express today are identical with the opinions I expressed twenty years ago. A man may be grandly consistent and Lord." And once the false shame has laid hold of a man, it speedily operates in every part of his life. "This shame," says Faithful, "is a bold villain. I could scarcely shake him out of my company." All the fears I have mentioned minister to the growth of this perilous shame. They seduce us into disloyalty to our sober convictions; they make us crucify the Son of Man afresh.

"Be not thou ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner." Such is another form in which the false shame declares itself. "Nor of me His prisoner!" Do not be ashamed of the cause when the battle seems to be going against it! Do not desert, when the cause becomes unpopular and its leaders are in prison! Hold fast to the right even when it walks in chains! It is easy to hold fellowship with the Lord when He enters Jerusalem amid the cries of "Hosannas." It is another matter to be true to Him when He enters the same city amid the hostile howl of "Crucify Him! Crucify Him!"

It was pleasant and gratifying to be with Paul when he was esteemed as a god. It is quite a different matter when he is now immured in a Roman jail. The Apostle profoundly appreciated the confidence of the men and women who were true to him in his bondage. "The Lord have mercy upon the house of Onesiphorus, for he was not ashamed of my chains." Onesiphorus was true to his leader when his leader was "down." He was not ashamed of the Gospel when its messengers were in bonds. His torch was flaming in the night of persecution. He was not the victim of a false shame. Such is the loyalty which makes the witnessing angels wonder, and adds strength and jubilation to their song.

NOW, how can we resist the approaches of a false shame? How can we overthrow the snare of the world? "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel." That is the temper of resistance. "According to the power of God." That is the dynamic of resistance. Let us look at the temper. "Be thou partaker of the afflictions."

Do not seek to avoid them, rather be eager to share them. Lay hold of them and feed upon them, as though they contained the elements of a feast. Do not stop thy Christian pilgrimage when the road becomes rough and steep. Go on! Let the bystanders laugh, let them heap upon thee derision and contempt. Go on!

I was talking to a friend a day or two ago, who had just come back from his holiday, and he was enthusiastic about the natural glory of the place where he had been staying. "Any cycling?" I asked. "No," he replied, "no such easy roads. But I will tell you what there is, lots of hand-and-knee work, plenty of difficult climbing; but the panoramas! the outlooks! they are indescribable!"

I could not keep my friend's description out of my thought. The road which demanded hand-and-knee work led to splendid panoramas! Surely it offers abundant suggestion as to the inward meaning of my text. "Be thou partaker of the affliction." If loyalty to Christ should make thee appear odd, and leave thee apart in solitary pilgrimage, go on! If it should make thee appear unmanly, go on! Go valiantly on; "the Lord is mindful of His own"; and when the laugh of bystanders in the valley is forgotten, thine own exuberant laugh shall peal from the mountain-top.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Showers of Blessing," or "When the Roll is Called up Yonder."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Luke 12:16-30. "Worldly Cares Forbidden."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 409, first column.)

Sermon—"FALSE SHAME"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"At the Cross," or "Saved by Grace."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Bless us now, we beseech Thee, eternal and merciful One, as we dismiss ourselves from this hour of fellowship to find that it has brought us together in a better understanding of one another's needs and hopes and joys. And bless the tasks of the week with thy peaceful benediction, we ask in our need, in the name of our Redeemer, Jesus Christ. AMEN.

may change his opinions every year. The abiding matter in all true consistency is not loyalty to past opinions, but loyalty to my God! To be true to what I conceive to be truth, even though the light of today change my conception of yesterday, is the consistency which is honored of God. And therefore it is a manly thing to say, "My opinions are changed, I no longer hold to the words I uttered a year ago!" The confession may call forth the contempt of men, and may subject the confessor to bitter humiliation. And it is just because the consequences of a true consistency often land a man in this unwelcome valley that so many are false to their Lord. They are "ashamed of the testimony of our Lord."

THERE is the fear of losing social regard. When Faithful is describing to Christian his encounter with Shame, he uses the following words: "He objected also that but few of the mighty, rich or wise were ever of my opinion." Such arguments have driven many into shameful cowardice. Not to have the support of the mighty, the rich, or the wise, is to tempt men into the perils of a false shame. To win the regard of the rich and the mighty many men and women have played false with the truth. They have been "ashamed of the testimony of our

A Noble Abstinence

SUNDAY. 1 Pet. 2:11. "Abstain from fleshly lusts." That is the first note in the forceful life. Do not let us so narrow its interpretation that the majority of us escape the grip of the apostle's injunction.

Let us attribute a comprehensive content to the unwelcome word, "lust." Lust includes the entire army of unclean forces which are antagonistic to the exalted realm of the spirit. It includes not only the carnal desire, but the jealous eye and the itching palm. It comprehends every form of heated and feverish motion which is destructive of spiritual treasure.

Fleshly lust is anything in the life which steams the windows of the spirit. Fleshly lust is inclusive of envy, jealousy, avarice, insatiable selfishness, and immoderate ambition. "Abstain from fleshly lusts," from any excessive heat which maintains its fire by consuming the furniture of the soul.

Now, what is this but a plea for the ascendancy of spirit? It is a plea for the magnificent passion of moderation, and for the imposing grace of a noble self-restraint. "Abstain from fleshly lusts." Do not let any fire get outside the bars. Do not let the flames reach the furniture. Hold everything in its place. Suffer no usurpation. Do not let the lower supplant the higher. Rigidly observe the distinction of subject and sovereign, and preserve the purity of the throne.

Such is the all-inclusive meaning of the apostolic counsel. In the constitution of man there is a Divine order. His powers are arranged in ranks and gradations. The science of life is the doctrine of gradation; the art of living is the recognition of gradation. I suppose that George Combe did a great service to the cause of practical thinking when, seventy years ago, he wrote his work on "The Constitution of Man." I am not aware that there was anything new in the philosophy of the book. It only confirmed the teaching of the entire range of philosophy, stretching back from his own day to the days of Socrates and Plato.

And what was the teaching? That the powers of the human personality are arranged in heightening gradation, and that the secret of beautiful living consists in awarding to each rank its own precise and peculiar value. The service rendered by George Combe consisted in the attempt to make this philosophy a plain, practical rule for common life. I find in the resources of my personality regiments of diverse powers. I find vital forces, affectional forces, social forces, moral forces, spiritual forces. I find elements whose kinship is with the swine, and I find elements which have the luster and the preciousness of pearls.

What is the art of successful and forceful living? "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine." Do not treat swine and pearls as though they were of equal value. Recognize an aristocracy among the powers, and to them give the preference and the sovereignty. When there are two calls in the life, the bark of the dog and a voice from the sanctuary, "give not that which is holy unto the dogs," but ever keep the lowest under the severe jurisdiction of the highest. "Abstain from fleshly lusts." Do not allow any lower power to prowl about in loose licentiousness. Keep the chain on.

"Let your moderation be known unto all men." Exercise the ministry of a well-ordered life. Let all the powers in the life be well drilled, well disciplined, healthily ranked, each one in its place, from the private soldier up to the commander-in-chief. "Abstain from fleshly lusts." The primary characteristic of forceful, influential character is the ascendancy of the spirit. J. H. J.

The Temptations of Jesus

MONDAY. Luke 2:49. "I must." This was the keynote of our Saviour's life. The conscience of the moral universe was in his breast. The ethical imperative controlled Him. "Thus it is written," He said, "and thus it must be." "All things must needs be fulfilled."—"The Son of Man must be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." It thus appears that He was irresistibly bound by the cords of an eternal needs-be; yet within those cords He was the freest of the free, because they were "the cords of a man."

He was tempted to deviate from the appointed path; but He swerved not an hair's-breadth. When tempted by Satan in the wilderness to accomplish His redemption purpose in some other way, His sufficient answer was, "It is written." When tempted by the people to accept the Messianic crown, He refused because this was not the appointed way. When tempted by Peter to further His plans by the use of carnal weapons, He said, "Put up thy sword into the sheath. How then should that be accomplished which is written of me?" When tempted by His own flesh, in Gethsemane, where every tingling nerve and sinew cried out against the cup of purple death. He, though sweating as it were great drops of blood, acquiesced in the divine purpose, saying, "O my Father, if it be not possible that this cup should pass, Thy will be done!"

Thus on He went, straight on, with face set steadfastly toward the cross. That was the destination of His normal life. "It is finished!" He cried at the last. "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do!"

Close the book; all is fulfilled. So runs the story of the perfect Man. D. J. B.

His Legacy of Peace

TUESDAY. John 14:27. "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." Here we see two strange things: first, in the hour in which Christ was being hounded and hurried to His death, He had peace; moreover, He had peace to spare, peace to give away. It was the logical culmination of a life in every period of which He had known peace. His had been the experience Goethe's words describe: "that highest state of tranquillity in which one loves what he commands himself to love." Was it not so?

What was the secret of Christ's peace? Petrarch gives us an answer to the question. He says, "The enemies of peace are avarice, ambition, envy, anger, pride." These were absent from Christ's heart. This tells the story.

Peace is one thing. Christ's peace is another. The first promise is to the world, "Peace I leave with you"; the second is to His own people in the world, "My peace I give unto you." He came to bring peace. He is the Prince of Peace. His is the gospel of reconciliation. It is also the gospel of good-will, which means peace among men. But "His peace" has a very special meaning. It is a personal possession. It is an inward serenity. It is a calm, composed self-command, which means a command of circumstances.

We all know how the world gives peace—or how it tries to but fails. The world imagines peace can come with a change of environment, with increase of privileges. God knows there can be no peace while the human heart is alien to the will of God. The secret of Christ's peace is both negative and positive. Not only were there absent from His heart the enemies of peace, but there were present these three things: the acceptance of the Father's will, obedience to the laws of the spirit, and an attitude of soul which makes one superior to time and sense. God gives us His peace that we may do lowly things on high levels, that we may fight our battles above the clouds. C. C. A.

In Time of Storm

WEDNESDAY. Acts 27:31. "Except ye abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved." Julius Caesar once said, while in a great storm at sea, "Pluck up your courage; you carry Caesar." Paul had more than the egotistical consciousness of genius. He had heard the Voice Divine and he believed God. He felt the call of a great mission; he must see Rome also, and his determination made him fearless. He must preach the Gospel at the central city of the world, and in his prison pulpit speak through his Epistles to all coming ages.

To the sailors and passengers, he appeared to be a poor, insignificant Jewish criminal, hardly worth saving. How little they thought they were carrying the greatest man of his time! Paul being aboard saved the ship's company; they listened to his words of warning as though an oracle from heaven had spoken; all consenting to remain in the ship were safely landed.

Saving the great Apostle from shipwreck meant more to the world than Caesar's victory in war, more than Rome ruling the world; it meant Christ, the Conqueror of all kingdoms, King of all thrones. It meant Columbus to discover a new continent, where a republic would be founded, pointing all mankind Christward. It meant Luther and Protestantism, Wesley and Methodism. Paul was a link in the golden chain of Providence that was to bind all peoples to the throne of the Highest. The mistress of the world must hear the mighty preacher and spread the glories of the cross everywhere.

Moral heroes are immortal till their work is done. Bunyan must write his Pilgrim's Progress in prison and Milton his Paradise Lost in blindness.

The old ship, Zion, sailing over the ocean of time, has often faced wreck in tempestuous storms of war, in floods of blood, famine and panic, but God's angels, whispering to some endowed leader, have brought the vessel into port without the loss of a passenger. Christ, the mighty Captain at the helm, guides all with safety. In our voyage over the ocean of life, let us remain in the Gospel ship, for the dark waters of unbelief are dangerous and deadly. Abide with the Captain, obey the Commander, accept the advice of God's ambassadors if you would be brought safe to the port of immortals. E. W. C.

The Plus Sign in Minus Lives

THURSDAY. Eph. 6:14. "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Paul abandoned his life to all that the cross could mean to him and his ministry. What did he mean by the phrase "glorying in the cross"? Certainly he did not mean to stress the wooden instrument of torture and death. The cross is a symbol. It is representative of a certain kind of life. It is a perpetual reminder of the life that Jesus manifested, and the result of that life led to the crucifixion.

It was a life that yielded a rich vocabulary. Some of the words in that vocabulary are obedience, loyalty, truth, love, duty, others, ministry, unselfishness. These are suggestive of the eternal values that are associated with and interpreted in the light of the will of God. They represent the cross-life, the life sacrificial, the Via Dolorosa. Paul chose that kind of a life and gloried in it. He walked that path gladly, triumphed in its demands, rejoiced in its possibilities. It was not a dead weight of dull routine, but a living principle of undaunted devotion.

The tragedy of the ages is not that men have not lived the life of sacrifice. The tragedy is that men have chosen and gloried in the wrong causes, abandoned themselves to the losing standards. Christianity has a cross. The world has a cross. Both have their philosophy of thought and conduct. Our philosophy determines our destiny, controls thinking, guides action, prompts motives, dictates choice. Christianity stresses others; the world stresses self. The first is minus; the second is plus. The cross of the world is subtraction and impoverishes; the cross of Christ is addition and enriches.

It is this cross-life of service in the interest of the greatest good to the greatest number that hallows living and crowns the crowded ways with brotherhood. R. B.

According to Your Faith

FRIDAY. Matt. 9:29. "According to your faith be it unto you." Here is a statement that seems to sound all right, but may not exactly fall in line with some of our ideas. But that, of course, is not strange, for are we not continually coming into touch with sayings and facts of life which at first seem to relegate all our notions to the realm of Topsy-Turvydom? Now, in the matter of God's supply for our needs, how often perhaps we have taken the needs themselves as the measure of the supply. We quote: "And my God shall supply all your needs." Certainly; but remember it is "according to His riches in glory." And then we think that insistent prayer is going to almost force the hand of God. God wants us to come again and yet again. But often we receive not because we ask amiss. But is not God willing that we should receive these blessings from our loving Father? Undoubtedly, and sometimes I think that He is more disappointed then we are, when it becomes necessary to refuse.

But as a matter-of-fact, God has put the measure of our blessings in our hands—"According to your faith." Simple, like a great many other things; but as sure as God is true! By the exercise of your faith you make yourself big enough to use the blessing which the great Father-heart longs to bestow upon you. And God is only as great to you as you believe Him to be! I. D. L.

Threshing Over Old Straw

SATURDAY. Prov. 26:20. "Where there is no tale-bearer the strife ceaseth." Some people persist in always threshing over old straw and in doing so they only raise a big dust and get nothing of value. The farmer is too wise to do that. He knows that wheat and oats only need to be threshed once, and though old straw may contain a few odd kernels of grain, it would be absurd to think of putting it through the mill again, to say nothing of the dust and dirt that would be raised.

Old troubles and topics of gossip, like old straw, get musty. Let them alone; don't start something unpleasant by threshing them over.

There are a lot of things we ought to remember. If we kept green the memory of all the kindness done us and all the love bestowed upon us, it would be well. But there are a lot of things we do well to forget. Those points of disagreement with friends and members of the family; those historic occasions, when somebody has acted foolishly, or spoken rashly, or done wrong. It's hardly fair to stand by everlastingly with a reminder. It accomplishes little by way of argument or correction for the future. Those matters have probably been thrashed out a long time back. One of the hardest things to learn to do is to drop the things that have been talked out. H. P. H.

ISN'T THIS YOUR PROBLEM?

"Which washer will save me the most money, not only in just a few wash-days, but in ten years of use?"

Real saving comes from long, uninterrupted service. Real content comes from utter confidence that your washer will always work faithfully, and the knowledge that your washing will be done exactly as you want it.

Your washer must have these properties whether you, or a servant, or a day laundress, do the work. This is simply household efficiency, which will be clearly shown in decreased household and clothing expenses.

You will find your problem solved in the satisfied smiles of thousands of users of the Coffield Electric Washer. An answer a hundred times more convincing than any we could put in print.

Your local Coffield Dealer—the "Wash-day Smile Shop"—will be mighty pleased to give you any information you may desire. Let us send his name.

Making the World Christian

International Sunday-School Lesson for June 12

Isa. 11:1-10; Acts 1:6-9

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

CHILDREN'S Day and "Making the World Christian" are closely related. The Christian adults will not win this world to a saving knowledge of Christ, but the Christian children of today can win the children of the next generation if they will. Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D., of London, who then was president of the World's Sunday-School Association, said at the Rome Convention: "If the world is ever to be saved, it must be saved through its childhood." But the youth of today are thinking too little of the Christian ministry as their life work. In the class to be graduated from Amherst college this month there is just one, according to a statement just seen in a newspaper, who will enter the ministry, whereas 54 will go into business, and 27 into law, medicine or other professions.

Isaiah gives a wonderful picture of peace on earth in his sublime prophecy of the branch from the stock of Jesse. Those verses should be memorized by all who are not too old to do so. Antagonistic natures can be changed by the entrance of the Christ-life into each, and then all can work together with Christ to make the world actually Christian. The day is coming when, as the golden text states: "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea." Meanwhile the ethics of Christianity are being accepted among countless millions of non-Christians.

Ascension Day came in the experience of Him who was the fulfillment of the prophecy by Isaiah. The heaven of Christian righteousness was already working and eleven apostles with many disciples were able to effectively receive the Great Commission. They were told that they would have the power of the Holy Spirit as they began at Jerusalem and went to the uttermost part of the earth. They began their obedience and the Acts of the Apostles is the first great chapter in the history of the Christian Church. This chapter has been ceaselessly added to ever since. Huss, Luther, Knox, and Livingstone, not to mention others, have loyally obeyed the words of the Master spoken that day when "the cloud received Him out of their sight." The modern Acts of Apostles are rich in the record of spiritual victories as such men as Underwood, Moody and Grenfell preach the ever-blessed Gospel.

THAT the world is changing from a neighborhood to a brotherhood is now a familiar statement. Isolation is no longer possible. Recently the Literary Digest, in writing of world trade relations said: "Closing a barrel factory in Kokomo, Ind., may be dependent upon the state of European exchange." The daily newspapers in Tokio not only give the baseball scores of the league teams in the United States, but even recount some of the innings in detail. Postcard pictures of movie stars were more in evidence in Japan than had been noted in any American city. Commercially, the world is one vast field. The scope is no different when children of our Heavenly Father face squarely the command of our Elder Brother.

From the present membership of the Sunday school will come at least 99 per cent. of the missionaries, preachers and Christian leaders who will be inducted into office in the decade beginning with 1930. They will be participating in the Children's Day exercises on this June 12. In them we find the Army of Possibility which will win against sin and ignorance. Effective teaching of this lesson will not stop short of the most earnest appeal to the membership of class, department and school by officers, pastors and teachers, urging (1) belief in the Saviour and (2) enlistment in special home or foreign service as soul-winners or Christian teachers, medical missionaries, etc. If the observance of Children's Day prevents the study of this lesson, be very particular to teach the lesson with the one for the following Sunday.

What is being accomplished in missionary work abroad is a rightful study in connection with this lesson. No matter what is your denomination become familiar at least with the names of the countries where your church is carrying on missionary work. Ask your pastor and he will gladly loan you the last report of your foreign mission board, or write to that board for a copy. Last week you were urged to obtain similar information about your church in the home field. Then decide on some one country, if you are not prepared to study the entire field, and become well acquainted with the work of your church in that particular country. Get such a book as "Five Missionary Minutes," by Rev. George H. Trull, and you will find many helpful and workable suggestions to enable you to know much more about the outreach of missions. It has been said that "lack of missionary enthusiasm is due to lack of missionary information." Send to the writer of these lesson studies for the Surplus Material plan of co-operation by which you can send even pictures to some missionary who wants this help. The address is 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City. Would that you could hear the Sunday-school children in Korea and Japan sing "Jesus Loves Me," and your eagerness to help would be increased many fold.

WHILE we are thinking about the world problem we must not neglect the "Jerusalem" where Christ called for witnessing. Look at the children who will be gathered by the millions in our Sunday schools on this Children's Day and have in mind that experts declare that out of every five in the Sunday school two will accept Christ while in the school, and a third will do so after leaving the school. The other two leave the school never to become followers of their Lord. If the world is to be made Christian these two should also be won. Both the primaries and juniors, in studying this lesson, should have their attention directed to John 10:1-16. There the Good Shepherd is declaring that there is no safety except for the sheep within the fold and under His immediate care. Jesus here also parallels the peace description given by Isaiah as he says: "They shall become one flock, one shepherd." It is a wonderful picture.

"Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," is the prayer which we are seeking to follow up with our works. Too often we merely say that prayer. To pray for it is to strive for its fullest accomplishment. What country, or mission station, or missionary are you daily praying for?

A memorable experience, which those present will never forget, was on the closing night of the World's Sunday School Convention held in Zurich in 1913. Dr. Meyer asked every one to repeat in concert John 3:16, "For God so loved the world." But it was to be spoken by each in his own language. Representatives of more than thirty nationalities were present and the vast audience of about 3,000 joined in saying, "For God so loved the world." The first impression was a jargon of sound as if the Tower of Babel confusion was being re-enacted; then the deeper meaning asserted itself, namely, that here the nations of the earth, through their representatives, were declaring the supreme love of God expressed by the free gift of his beloved Son that mankind might be eternally saved. As we stood there, hand clasped with brother, the vision glorious of John was close indeed, of tribes and kindred and tongues and peoples, thronging into the New Jerusalem through the twelve gates to the glory of Him who is King of kings, and Lord of lords.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, hereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

APPEALS to the Prayer League during the past week have been received from many states asking for prayers, as follows: for better health, 50; financial aid, 6; guidance, 4; wisdom, 2; conversion of friends, 28; blessing, 4; greater faith, 9; reunion, 3; "heart's desire," 5; employment, 1; forgiveness of sin, 1; success in certain plans, 2. Grateful acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received as follows: for cure of bad habits, 5; for spiritual advancement, 2; and for answers to requests submitted through the League, 4.

Mrs. G. E. S., Freeman River, Alta., writes: "There is no Sunday school or church here for miles. Please pray that God will open the way."

"I have been requested to send in a petition for prayers in behalf of our M. E. Church," writes L. A. D., Cass City, Mich. "Pray that God will send His spirit in convicting, saving power, that the church may 'see Jesus,' and that we may be filled with the Spirit and become alive in Christ Jesus, and that we may be workers for our blessed Lord and Master."

M. M. B., Reidsville, N. C., writes: "Will you earnestly plead with a kind Heavenly Father that He will grant faith, strength and endurance through a serious and dangerous surgical operation, to our aged grandmother, who is so much needed by an invalid husband and some little motherless grandchildren left to her care and keeping."

E. P., Florence, Ala., writes: "Please pray for me that I may be restored to health again, if it is God's will; also that we may have a revival in our church this year."

"Please pray that I may find salvation," writes Mrs. J. A. M., Milton, W. Va.

"I wish to join the Prayer League," writes Mrs. E. W., Big Sandy, Mont., "and ask for prayers in behalf of my mission. Pray that we may come into perfect union and win many precious souls to Christ."

Mrs. A. L. asks prayers for a revival at Gate, Okla., and Mrs. A. W. asks the League to remember the revival meetings which will be held at Milton, Iowa.

"Pray with us for an outpouring of God's Holy Spirit on our church at Grindstone Hill, Pa.," writes Mrs. G. W. H., "that many precious souls may be saved."

"Would like to ask the interest of the League in praying for our revival," writes Dwight Arnold, Arcanum, O.

Mrs. J. S. E., Albany, Texas, writes: "Pray that we may have rain out here in west Texas. Our small grain will be ruined in a few days if we don't get rain; also pray that we may experience a revival in this country soon."

Mrs. E. M. T., Jamestown, N. Y., writes: "Please ask the dear Father in Heaven to strengthen the sight of my little mother's eyes and to grant me the use of my arms and hands—if it be His will."

Mrs. A. H. asks prayers for the conversion of a brother and wife, and "that they may grow in kindness toward an aged parent."

A Mother asks special prayers in behalf of a married daughter, that she may be brought to see the error of her ways.

Mrs. E. A. G., writes: "Please pray especially for my little son, who can not develop mentally unless we have divine help."

A Mother in Sioux Falls, S. D., writes: "I need your helping prayers so much, for my heart and house are so full of trouble. I have an aged mother who is an invalid. Won't you pray for her recovery and strength, that she may have some bright and happy hours along the way? Also pray for my husband, that he may turn his face and heart to God."

W. L. B., Arkansas, asks for the Divine help in a hard fight against evil.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4, 6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates pay 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co. 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

which have been issued by these companies.

CONGRESS passed a bill last year ordering the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates which would enable the railroad companies to earn five and one-half per cent. on their real value. This does not mean that the Government guarantees this interest, but it merely means that the companies as a whole are entitled to earn that much money, provided they can get it, and if they earn more than that they will have to pay one-half of any surplus over to the Government. Just now the railroads are not earning this 5 1/2 per cent., or anything like it, because wages are high and business is poor. It is now hoped that expenses will be reduced and that wages, which have more than doubled since 1917, will come down and that the coal bill, which amounts to about $700,000,000 a year, will be cut by about $200,000,000. It is also expected general business will pick up again soon. In any event, railroad bonds are good because they represent only two-thirds of the value of the properties. Of course, this does not mean that each and every bond issue is good, because some few railroads were built by people who were too hopeful and have not enough business to enable them to earn their interest. In some other cases the management is not as good as it ought to be, and these roads can not earn their interest.

There are all kinds of mortgages, first, second, third, fourth and fifth mortgages, and some fifth mortgages may be better than some first mortgages, but generally the old issues are better than the newer issues. On the whole, railroad bonds are good and when money gets cheaper they will again sell very much higher than they do now. Money ought to get cheaper now, as it has after every war, because the Government no longer needs to borrow to buy property which is destroyed in the course of war.

Money borrowed in times of peace is intended to be used for construction purposes, by which is meant that it is used for the purpose of enabling people to make or save money. For instance, if a new railroad is built, it may open up additional mines or lands which may enable the farmer to transport his goods to market more cheaply. If a factory is built, it is intended to give employment to people engaged in doing something useful and supply articles which are in demand. Manufacturing for war purposes means exactly the opposite, it consisted largely in the production of goods which were promptly destroyed or largely wasted. It is for this reason that money during war times always becomes scarce and the interest rate advances.

There has been much discussion as to whether railroad bonds are good; in fact the newspapers throughout the country have at times printed speeches by various persons who claim that the railroads are overcapitalized. The railroads of the United States are capitalized now for about nineteen billions: Two-thirds of this, or twelve and one-half billions, is represented by bonds, and six and one-half billions by stock.

In order to find out whether the railroads really are overcapitalized—or to use a common expression, whether their securities had been "watered"—Congress has instructed the Interstate Commerce Commission to have all the railroad properties valued. This valuation work has now been going on for about seven years and has been about completed on a number of the large properties. It has been found that while few of the railroads are overcapitalized most of the larger ones are undercapitalized, that is, the cost of reproducing their properties at pre-war prices would be considerably greater than the total amount of securities

Young People's Topic for June 12

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Out and Out for Christ

C. E., B. Y. P. U., and E. L. 1 Cor. 2:1-5

PAUL was an out-and-out Christian. In other words he was a Christian in every walk of life in which he found himself day by day. Christianity as lived by Christian men and women must put on every-day clothes and go to work six days in the week. Contrary to other forms of labor it must not rest on the Sabbath day. Real Christians do not mince matters, never apologize, are never neutral, can be found occupying the same ground at all times under every circumstance, no matter what the occasion. Some so-called Christians may be characterized as in-and-out Christians. They are splendid acrobats but make a poor show for the cause. It is difficult to serve God and mammon. To try to be a Christian in some places and not in others will result in catching an individual off guard and prove him not a Christian at all. An out-and-out Christian is an inspiration. An in-and-out Christian is a detriment.

Paul, nearing the close of his career could say "I have kept the faith." That is far better than being able to say "I have become famous" or "I have become rich," or "I have become popular." Better to near the border line of this life and the next poor, unknown, and unpopular, as the world interprets these words, than to be all of these negative values minus a consistent Christian character. Better to put oneself on record through the years for the things that spell the highest to ourselves and our fellow men in the realm of ministry and sacrificial service, than to go down the years known only as one who thought only of self and personal gain. Who are the greatest men and women in all history? Those who were consistent Christians. History proves this on every page. All the boons and blessings of progress and civilization are the convincing memorials of the fact. The real builders and the real constructors are the followers of Christ.

seeking a more suitable subject. She gallantly strove to assume her best society manner. "So foolish of me to talk about the baby," she said gamely. "Are you interested in—in grand opera?"

Thorngate stared. "Grand opera?" he repeated. "Not in mine! What was it Douglas found?"

AT HER end of the table Mrs. Thorngate was trying to beguile Douglas. "So you call the baby Junior?" she remarked. "Does he look like you?"

"Why, really, I don't—" Douglas began, when Marion interrupted him. "Why, he's the perfect image of you, Douglas. He's got the sweetest little nose and the most beautiful eyes and—"

"The Supreme Court handed down an interesting decision the other day. Did you happen to see it?" Douglas turned to his employer after transfixing his wife with a fresh glare.

"Not interested," said that gentleman curtly. "What were you saying about the baby's looks, Mrs. Ogden?"

But Mrs. Ogden was not saying. She looked quite unlike her usual radiant self and it was no surprise to her hosts when shortly after the dismal meal had come to an end and conversation was languishing in the living-room, she declared she had a severe headache and must go home. No, they were not to send the car. She needed the walk, and please, might she go at once?

Outside the door, Marion clutched her husband's arm. "Hurry, Douglas," she cried. "Suppose baby is really sick. We should never have said that he was. You can't tell about the effect of such evil thoughts. They might have a psychic effect; you can't tell. Hurry!"

"Nonsense!" returned Douglas. "You're hysterical. But—well, I guess we stayed long enough. Come along."

And the Ogdens fled homeward.

Back in the living-room, Thorngate was enjoying his triumph. "What did I tell you? How could a fellow like that get along with a lot of men—enter into their lives, get into touch with their family affairs? Why he can't get up a decent interest in his own child, let alone anyone's else. And that girl—pretty enough, but what's the matter with her? Seems to be flighty. Or what's the matter with the baby? Is it an imbecile or deformed or something else it shouldn't be that neither one of them would speak of it?"

Mrs. Thorngate turned from the window where she had watched the Ogden's precipitate departure. "No," she said. "I don't think there is anything the matter with the baby. Nor with the Ogdens. Just wait a while about filling that place, Dick."

But Thorngate had gone grumblingly back to his papers.

DOUGLAS managed to catch an earlier train home the next day. They had found the baby perfectly well and happy when they had rushed to him so madly, but Marion's unlucky reference to the possible effect of a mental attitude on physical condition had borne fruit and Douglas was frankly worried. Moreover, Thorngate's attitude had been distinctly hostile and Douglas felt certain that he had been weighed in the scale as a possible factory manager and found lacking in all essential qualities. If only Marion had been able to stick out the afternoon. If only she was not quite so absurd over the baby—here Douglas hastened his step. Absurd! Hadn't she, hadn't he, enough to be absurd about with such a baby as Junior! If a cold business proposition like Thorngate had not the heart to see it, why it was his loss and the job could go hang.

He took the front steps two at a time and softly inserted his key. Then he was within the homey room once more—the room with its soft lights and its odors of dinner in the distance and a blue-gowned young woman holding on her white-aproned lap the justifiable cause of all their foolish pride. Douglas dropped to his hands and knees.

"Woof! Woof!" he cried. "Here comes a big black bear to eat up mother and boy! Woof! Woof!"

In the midst of Marion's soft laughter, the baby's joyous shrieks and the realistic growling of the bear, there was a light knock at the door. No one heard it, for now the little shirt had been pulled over a fuzzy head and the bear was sitting on his haunches, biting the pink toes.

"This little pig went to market," he began.

"Oh!" said someone at the door. "Oh, please may I come in?"

Her squirrel cape slipping from her shoulders unheeded, her eyes shining with joy, Mrs. Thorngate came in, her arms outstretched. "I called to ask about your headache and the baby's cold," she said breathlessly. "The door was open and no one answered the bell. So I came in, but you did not hear my rap. Oh, please, may I take him—do you think he would mind?"

Douglas, scarlet with embarrassment, scrambled to his feet, but Marion with a comprehending smile held out her hand without rising. "He's so good," she said simply, quite as if the unexpected visitor was an everyday occurrence, "he won't mind in the least. If you'll put on his nightgown, I'll get his bottle ready." And she lifted the baby, white apron and all into the older woman's arms. As she went back to the kitchen she beckoned Douglas to follow.

"We're selfish beasts," she fairly hissed into his astonished ear. "It was the baby she wanted Sunday—not just us. To think of the way we acted—" Marion gave a little sob.

Left alone, Helen Thorngate hugged the little body close to her breast and the baby, recognizing her great need, cuddled down into her arms as she bent to kiss the delectable depression in the back of his neck. When the Ogdens came back they found her gently rocking and softly singing an old song while the firelight shone on her silvered hair and the happy tears glistened in her dark eyes. It was she who, presently, was given the inestimable privilege of carrying the wonderful being to his nursery, of presenting him with his bottle and of tucking him up snugly for the night, while Marion looked on with the understanding heart that comes with motherhood. When she came back to the living-room where a young father was trying to recast his philosophy, Mrs. Thorngate went up to Douglas and held out her hand.

"Junior is to dine with us Sunday," she said. "You may come along if you like and—and you need not be afraid to show us how much you love him, Mr. Ogden."

AT AN unfashionably early hour the next Sunday the Thorngates and their guests sat down to dinner. The battered yellow oak high chair stood between Mrs. Thorngate and Marion and the guest of honor sat thereon. There was simple food deliciously cooked, but what they ate was of small moment to the four persons who looked at the baby with eyes that saw nothing else.

The baby was delightfully at home. On the wooden tray, with its cupmarks made by the baby of other years, there reposed—occasionally—a collection of spoons and small silverware. Spasmodically, first one and then another of the adults present disappeared beneath the table to retrieve a discarded treasure. As Thorngate came up, red-faced and puffing, a silver spoon in his hand, the baby crowed and made a wild dash for his scarf-pin, and as Marion caught a flying dish-cover a small hand clutched at her carefully dressed hair and brought a strand across her face. Mrs. Thorngate looked on happily and surreptitiously fed the royal guest with bits from her untouched plate, Marion agreeing that just a little would not hurt him just this once.

One might not assert that conversation flourished. Yet on the other hand, neither did it languish. Four foolish, happy persons ate mechanically of what was placed before them and watched a wonderful being have his own sweet

Add This Beauty to your features—whiter teeth

Millions of people have learned a way to whiter, cleaner, safer teeth. A ten-day test will prove it, and that test is free.

This is to urge that you try the method. Watch how your teeth improve. See what beauty whiter teeth can add.

A dingy film

Teeth become coated with a dingy film. At first it is viscous—you can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

That film is what discolours, not the teeth. It dims the natural luster. But it also is the cause of most tooth troubles.

Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Must combat it

The ordinary tooth paste does not effectively combat film. So the tooth brush has left much of it intact. As a result, the best-brushed teeth will often discolor and decay. Very few people have escaped the troubles caused by film.

Dental science has now found effective film combatants. Authorities have amply proved them. Now leading dentists everywhere advise their daily use.

The methods are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And other factors, now considered essential, are included with them.

The five effects

Pepsodent attacks the film in two effective ways. It keeps the teeth so highly polished that film less easily adheres.

It stimulates the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

So every use brings five effects which authorities desire.

Watch it act

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film coats disappear. Watch the other good effects.

Ten days will show you how much this method means to you and yours. The facts are most important. Cut out the coupon now.

way. Occasionally there were interjections.

"He sleeps right through from six to six—"

"He's never been away for a meal before," this apologetically from Marion, "so his manners aren't perfect."

"Manners! Couldn't be improved on. They suit me all right," and Thorngate leaned across to add a gold pencil to the collection on the tray.

"What a perfectly lovely party," said Mrs. Thorngate, and meant it.

"He weighed nine pounds when he was born and he has never been sick a day in his life," boasted Douglas with unblushing evasion of his statements of a week ago.

When a beaming Mary, who had banished the waitress temporarily, had served the coffee and removed the dessert service, Thorngate arose and lifted the baby, high chair and all, to his end of the table. His eyes twinkled as he looked at his wife.

"You women can run along into the other room, now," he remarked. "We men have some business of importance to talk over."

The church will be properly financed and will no longer be dependent upon profit-making and the meager, irregular contributions of a part of its membership. The spiritual values of stewardship and worship giving will be realized in every member.

The social life of the church will be financed by the organization as part of its program of spiritual ministry and this will lead to a new sense of brotherhood where class distinctions will disappear and the welding process of spiritual equality will produce a union that will be potent in all its outreaches. Either the state or the church must take the amusement life of the people into its hands and put an end to the exploitation of the people's needs for self gain. It is profit-seeking on the part of the promoters of organized pleasures that causes them to pander to the low and vicious and thereby destroy the basis of orderly and Christian society. All people need amusement and relaxation, and part of any Christian's program is to obtain it and furnish it. The business man in the church will henceforth see to it that the pleasure life of the people is freed from the vicious and destructive elements. Not to do this will be to allow the destruction of every human safeguard. A people are made or unmade quite largely by their relaxation.

Our final thought in connection with the business man in the church needs to be a reminder that every individual life is a unit. Men talk about their business life, their social life, their home life and their church life as if these were four lives. I have heard that a cat had nine lives but man has only one life that must be lived in its various phases of activity and endeavor. If the business phase is not Christian the church relation will be a mockery, and if the social phase of a man's life does not promote his Christian well-being then he will be destroying his business powers as well as laying low the total forces of his one life. Life is a unit and any business man found in the membership of a Christian church needs to use a share of all the constructive powers of his whole life in order to produce a church organization that in turn will uplift him and all his fellows; making them builders of a true home circle, wise and thorough in their relaxations and pleasures, honest and true in all their business concerns and efficient in every spiritual relationship. Thus will they prove the reality of a Christian profession. The business man in the church must make that institution honored and respected in his community.

THE extent of the housing shortage abroad is indicated by a recent survey in England and Wales which showed that 795,000 houses were urgently needed. A new house which before the war cost $1,200 now costs $4,000.

tary of the Interior, and by many was regarded as the strongest man in the Wilson cabinet. His death—also following an operation, but due to heart disease—occurred in a hospital at Rochester, Minn.

Born in Canada in 1864, Mr. Lane was taken as a child to California by his parents and educated there, being graduated from the University of California in 1886. After several years in newspaper work, he began the practice of law and soon attained political prominence. In 1902 he was the Democratic candidate for Governor of California, and a year later received the party vote for United States senator. He entered national affairs in 1905 when Theodore Roosevelt appointed him to the Interstate Commerce Commission, of which he later became chairman, leaving that position to enter the cabinet. He resigned early in 1920 to enter business, feeling the necessity for making provision for his family, but his health had been poor for several months and after his death his brother announced that he left no estate.

Mr. Lane was master of clear and forcible English and several contributions by him have delighted readers of the Christian Herald. His patriotism was deep and he was an aggressive advocate of policies which would promote the nation's welfare.

GIOLITTI WINS IN ITALY. The Parliamentary elections in Italy resulted in a decisive victory for Premier Giolitti, and the parties which supported him won a total of 285 seats in the new Chamber of Deputies as against 189 in the old. The Socialists dropped from 170 to 120 seats and the Communists from 36 to 15, while the Catholic party managed to reelect its 100 Deputies. Although the vote was light, there was much disorder and the casualties reported as a result of the elections were 63 killed and more than 200 wounded.

REPUBLICANS TO HAVE NEW CHAIRMAN. John T. Adams of Dubuque, Iowa, is slated to succeed Postmaster General Will H. Hays as Chairman of the Republican National Committee when the Committee meets in Washington on June 8. Mr. Adams, who has been vice-chairman, is the choice of President Harding.

IMMIGRATION BILL SIGNED. The bill to restrict immigration by admitting in the next year, not to exceed three percent of the nationals of each country who were here in 1910, has been signed by President Harding and will take effect early in June. It expires July 1, 1922.

HARDING NAMES DIPLOMATS. President Harding has sent to the Senate the nominations of Richard Washburn Child, of Massachusetts, writer and editor, to be Ambassador to Italy, and of Jacob Gould Schurman, former president of Cornell University, to be Minister to China.

POPE URGES PEACE IN IRELAND. Pope Benedict has sent to Cardinal Logue, Primate of Ireland, a communication appealing to the British and Irish to abandon violence and proposing that the Irish question be settled by a body selected by the entire Irish people.

MINING DISORDERS SERIOUS. Disorders in the Mingo coal field on the West Virginia-Kentucky border, where a strike has been in progress for several months, have assumed the proportions of a small war and much property has been destroyed. President Harding was asked to send Federal troops to the scene, but held that the state forces should be adequate to restore order.

BODIES OF 5,000 SOLDIER DEAD RETURNED. The arrival at the port of New York of the bodies of 5,000 war dead from the battlefields of France, the largest number returned at any one time, was signalized by memorial services in which President Harding took part, having made the trip from Washington aboard the Presidential yacht Mayflower.

Owning an old flivver is no bar to social success, if you give it a coat of Effecto Auto Finishes.

Effecto makes jaded flivvers bloom like the flowers in spring! It puts a radiant gloss on them over night; a gloss that stays there longer than the finish on most new cars.

And Effecto is so good that no car, be it a Tin Lizzie or an Eight Cylinder Society Yacht is too good for Effecto.

Not a wax, polish or paint — Effecto was the first auto enamel, the original, genuine auto enamel. It flows out smoothly without brush marks or laps and dries quickly. 24 to 48 hours for drying (depending on the number of coats) and a little interesting work will make your car look like a brand new one.

Effecto is made in nine live enamel colors: Black, Blue, Green, Red, Brown, Yellow, Gray, Cream and White; also clear Finishing varnish and Top & Seat Dressing.

Top & Seat Dressing makes old upholstery and tops look like new. It also waterproofs them. Dries in fifteen minutes and won't get sticky.

Effecto is sold by paint, hardware and accessory dealers everywhere. Send for Color Card and Name of Dealer

KEEPING YOUNG HAPPY AND EFFICIENT

You can compel success in business, in society, in out-door sports, in everything worth while, if you have a healthy body and a clear head.

THE WAY TO DO IT

You can have both and keep young, happy and efficient, by following the suggestions in Dr. Savage's "Health and Success" (six illustrated pocket-size booklets), devoting only ten minutes a day to corrective exercises that have proved successful in thousands of cases. Look over the subjects treated.

DR. SAVAGE AN AUTHORITY

Dr. Savage is well known, both as physician and physical director. The graduates of his school of Physical Education are teaching physical training in schools and colleges all over the United States.

$100. VALUE FOR $5.00

In his studio in New York, hundreds of business and professional men and women are paying him large fees for restoring them to health and vigor, by the same methods as taught in "Health and Success," for which we are asking only $5.00.

SEND NO MONEY

We will send you the set of six booklets, without charge, for examination. Keep them for five days. If you then think they will do you and your family $5.00 worth of good, send us check or money order. If you send cash have it registered. Otherwise return them in good condition. A single idea may save you many times five dollars in drugs and tonics, or loss of time. These booklets will help you for the rest of your life. Each book is complete in itself, and several members of the family can use them at the same time.

OUR MAIL-BAG

More Letters Pleading for the Family Altar

EVERY mail brings us many more letters discussing the Family Altar. These mainly come from homes where the Altar has been a long-established institution, and in which the spiritual and material benefits that come from "keeping close to God" in the home have been demonstrated in many remarkable ways. The letters come from people in every station in life, some from the well-to-do and others from homes of poverty; but in all, the same story of helpfulness and encouragement is recorded. A reading of the letters should give stimulus to the re-erection of the Family Altar wherever it has been neglected. There is no greater spiritual need in this nation today.

Mother, Worcester, Mass., writes: "We have family worship. Week days, mother reads the Bible and offers prayer, all joining in the Lord's prayer. This is done immediately after breakfast, all being at breakfast at the same time. Sundays, the father leads, and a hymn is also sung by all. 'Is it possible and necessary in every home?' you ask. Answering the last first, I should consider it necessary in every home. Whether or not it is possible in every home, I would not say, although it seems to me, if it were a matter of duty and habit, it could be done. There are times when it might in some cases almost seem useless and impossible, as in these days everything must be done in a hurry and every one must either get to work or to school, but I do think if it were a matter of conscience, most people would find time for it."

Rev. G. H. Dix, Qu'Appelle, Sask., writes: "Your little article in the Christian Herald on the Family Altar and your invitation to readers to send in answers to your questions has just come to my notice. We have two small boys in our family, two and four years, who enjoy Family Worship as we do. Our readings are from Hurlbert's Bible Stories, which can easily be put in such form that the youngest child can understand them. Next we have singing, the boys always choosing the songs. They have learned several simple songs which they enjoy very much, and this seems to be their particular part of the worship. Then we have prayer, very brief and simple, ending with the Lord's Prayer in which all take part. So far this form of worship has worked very well in our case and has become a real part of our daily life. We hope that your agitation for the Family Altar may have far-reaching results."

Mrs. R. H. Stephenson, Belleville, Kans., writes: "We have an altar service daily, unless something we can not avoid hinders. My husband has to leave at 6.30 a. m. for his work, so my three children, 9, 6, and 3 years old, and myself carry it on without papa. I could not get through the day without the strength and grace we get from our service early in the morning. When papa is at home, he takes part. We read the Quiet Hour studies, partly (because they are short) for the children's sake, and the comments for my own thoughts to feed on. Then we sing, then all pray. The children each have a prayer and change off with the 23rd Psalm or Lord's Prayer or some other Scripture prayer. We pray in the simplest terms, so the children will learn. Then we finish with a song, singing it long after we are all at work again. I believe I would lose control and also the respect of my children if it were not for God's daily leadings. He certainly directs our ways if we give Him our wills."

J. C. R., Oakland, Ia., writes: "A few days ago I took up the Christian Herald and read the article on The Family Altar and was not much surprised to read that out of an audience of one thousand, mostly church people, fewer than fifty hands went up indicating the observance of family worship. I find conditions no better here in Oakland where I live. In our own home we have the Family Altar in the morning and evening. I read a short Scripture lesson, usually pertaining to the Sunday-school lesson for the coming Sunday; or we repeat in concert a short Psalm, or some Bible verses. Then I lead in prayer and we change off, so each member of the family leads in prayer some time each week, and in unison we close with the Lord's prayer. Prayers are short and to the point. Children are all present who are at home, and when we have company we make no change excepting to call on the company to lead in prayer, if a Christian. A Family Altar is possible in a home when there is system in retiring and getting up in the morning, and that depends largely on the parents. When it has become a regular custom in the home, it is keenly felt to be necessary. When for any reason mother and I are away from home, and the children are left alone, they conduct the Family Altar themselves. Our worship in the morning is before breakfast, while we are sitting around the table, and in the evening just after supper. If some one is very much in a hurry to get away, then we have worship before supper. I consider the Family Altar a very great blessing for the home church, school, and community."

Reader, Grass Valley, Calif., writes: "You ask 'Do you have a Family Altar?' Yes. In answer to the second question I will say my husband is still living and we were both church members when we were married, 55 years ago. Before we left the room the morning after, we knelt and established our Family Altar. The offering upon that Altar has never been omitted. As soon as we fell into regular ways in a home of our own, we drew back from the breakfast table, a passage of Scripture was read—each taking a verse—then we knelt, Mr. H. offered a prayer of thanksgiving and supplication, closing with the Lord's Prayer together. Just before retiring we bowed together—and the proper offering of praise and thanksgiving, with prayer for our absent loved ones, was made. In earlier years the Scripture was read and we knelt at the time of prayer; but later, as age and infirmity came on, we kept our seat at the table, and the passage from the Daily Meditation in the Christian Herald was read. Mr. H. clasped his hands upon the table and offered the prayer. If friends were with us, they were not asked to take any part unless courtesy demanded it. Sometimes, at the evening hour, I am asked to offer prayer, and do not refuse. Sometimes, too, when I have been too ill to be out of bed, my husband knelt beside it and taking my hand in his offered the customary prayer. There is nothing difficult about keeping up the Family Altar, if there is the real spirit of worship. Start in and the rest will settle itself."

Mrs. S. G. G., Newtonville, Mass., writes: "Getting up ten minutes earlier will do it. I rise at 5.20, dress leisurely, get breakfast, call the family at 6.30, have breakfast about 7, followed immediately by family worship. And there is plenty of time to take the eight o'clock train, allowing ten minutes to walk to station. If you really want to do a thing, you can."

A. Carruthers, Neogo, Ill., writes: "We have a Family Altar, although our four children are all married and with homes of their own, while my wife and I—each over seventy years of age—still retain the Altar. I read the home reading for the Lesson each morning. We each take turns in the prayer. A Family Altar is desirable in every home, quite as much so as any other meal, for God's word is the bread of life. No parent will ever regret having family worship, but I am fearful many sorrows will come to homes that otherwise would not come where it is neglected. Most children will remember the Family Altar in after years, when far from Father and Mother."

A. J. Hurley, Chester, Md., writes: "I am now in my fifties. When I was a child and home with Mother, all of the family were called together morning and night for family worship, and loved it. They have all crossed the river of death. I grew to be a man and married and then took up Family Worship again. My wife died and I am now alone; but still I conduct this family worship alone, in the same room and at the same altar, and I feel that it is one of the very important things for me. And surely it would not be amiss for any Christian."

Miss A. T., Urbana, Ill., writes: "The Family Altar is a great spiritual help. I pray in the morning and evening and at noon. (I am a member of the prayer league.) Three times a day. We read in our Bible that Christ prayed and He taught His disciples to pray. So I believe in the power of prayer."

Fine Cloth Binding.

The theme of this story has appealed to the greatest artists in the world, and they have painted marvellous pictures of scenes and incidents in Christ's most wonderful life. The greatest of these paintings are reproduced in this book by photography, and together they constitute THE WORLD'S GREATEST ART GALLERY. Estimated at the total value of the originals there would be over in this one book alone. Many of the originals could not be bought at any price. No other book on this subject contains so many famous pictures by so many famous artists.

A MILLION DOLLARS' WORTH OF PICTURES REPRESENTED

IT COMBINES THE MOST PERFECT LITERATURE WITH THE MOST PERFECT ART

It appeals to all that is best and noblest in the natures of men and women. It is a GREAT BOOK FOR CHILDREN—even those who are too young to read can learn from it the beautiful life of the Saviour who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," by studying the great paintings reproduced by the half-tone process from photographs which illustrate every phase of LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND, with particular reference to THE CHILDHOOD OF JESUS.

The fame of Frederick William Farrar, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Canterbury, author of "The Life of Christ," is secure. He is conceded to be one of the most learned theologians. This work has become standard in the Christian world.

OVER 350 REPRODUCTIONS OF FAMOUS PAINTINGS APPEAR IN THIS 725-PAGE BOOK

Every great art gallery in the world contains one or more great paintings of some great event in the life of Christ.

This book contains photographs of the greatest paintings of the Saviour in all the great Art Galleries of the World, with a complete index of the famous artists and sketches of their lives.

Time and money have been expended freely in order to make the collection of beautiful pictures the most complete gallery of religious paintings ever produced in a book at a popular price.

The intelligence is more quickly and surely educated by pictures than by description, yet in this book the work of one of THE GREATEST RELIGIOUS WRITERS of the age is combined with the work of THE GREATEST RELIGIOUS PAINTERS. This rare combination of the best in literature and art has created a wonderful demand for this book. Think of being able to get a copy for only 75c. additional to the cost of the Christian Herald for a year, $2.75 in all.

The big bargain is secured by renewing your subscription to the Christian Herald for one year (52 weeks), which will make the cost of the book only 75c., or $2.75 in all.

The book is sold separately for $1.50 a copy postpaid and will be found a great bargain at the price.

Here are facts that interest the mother and father of every child in America

Are you paying enough attention to the energy value of your children's food?

THE science of proper nutrition is one of the most modern of all exact sciences. We are finding out new things about food every day.

It isn't enough just to eat any kind of food. You must eat the right kind of food to get the best nutritive results.

There are foods that build up the system and there are other foods that supply heat and energy to run the system.

The most important of all these energy foods is Dextrose, the wonderful energy sugar, which is absorbed directly into the blood.

What is Dextrose?

You could not live long without Dextrose. The starch and sugar in all the food you eat—bread, vegetables, rice, potatoes or fruit—must be changed into Dextrose before your system can use them as energy foods.

These are scientific facts, supported by the very highest authorities.

There is a very large percentage of Dextrose in Karo syrup, and Karo itself in a form to be most easily digested and absorbed into the system.

This is why food experts everywhere are recommending Karo—the great energy food, for children, as well as for everyone who works hard and uses up a lot of energy.

Why children must have plenty of nourishing food

Children need more food than adults. Their active life and more rapid growth demand, in proportion to their weight, just about twice the amount of food a grown person needs.

A child uses up a lot of vitality in active play and study. This explains the perfectly natural craving of almost every normal child for a wholesome sweet like Karo.

What some authorities say about Karo and Dextrose

Dr. Edwin F. Bowers, noted writer on foods, says "Karo is one of the most valuable of all energy foods for growing children. It is unusually palatable, and its heavy dextrose content makes it an ideal food for little human dynamos in short dresses and knickerbockers."

Dr. William H. Porter, great food authority, says that dextrose "develops increased resistance to fatigue, and a greater capacity for sustained mental and physical effort. The nervous system shows more stability. Children seem to develop a better color, as well as an increase in the appetite, and in the capacity for assimilating food."

Dr. William J. Gies, Professor of Chemistry at Columbia Medical School, says "Quantities of dextrose, equal to reasonably large shares of the requirements for heat-yielding material, may be eaten daily, indefinitely, with high nutritive advantage."

Give the children all the Karo that Nature tells them to eat—on well-done pancakes, spread on sliced bread, or made into pure home-made candies, and in all your cooking and baking.

It will make them sturdy and robust, and more active for work, play or growth.

FREE A booklet every parent should read. Tells all about the wonderful value of Karo; explains the meaning of Dextrose and why children thrive on it. Sent free with the beautifully illustrated Corn Products Cook Book of sixty-four pages. Write Corn Products Refining Company, Argo, Ill.

Your Protection

Do not be deceived by cans containing syrup that might look like Karo. The name "Karo" is on every can of original Karo—look for it and be assured of full weight cans and highest quality.

BLUE Karo

The standard table syrup. Also for cooking, baking and candy making. Light brown color, delicious flavor—a heavy-bodied syrup.

GREEN Karo

Flavored with highest grade real maple sugar. Very moderate in price—absolutely pure. The makers of Karo are the world's largest users of the highest grade maple sugar—over a thousand tons used annually.

RED Karo

The Ideal Syrup for every use—for cooking, baking, candy making and preserving. Because of its honey-like appearance many prefer it as a spread for cakes, biscuits, breads.

With half-naked native boys tending modern machines, as in this scene from the jute industry in Calcutta, the Church must consider well the possibilities for exerting its strength so that the industrialization of such lands as India may be carried forward in a Christian way

The Missionary in Overalls

IN a thoughtful book, "The Economic Transition of India," Theodore Morison makes a succinct classification of nations: those that have passed through the Industrial Revolution and those that have not. As an Englishman writing a book about India he chooses England as his chief example of the former group and India of the latter, and proceeds to draw a suggestive analogy—more than an analogy, if perchance there are laws determining what course nations must pursue—showing that the economic history of India is destined to the progressive stages which England has traversed during the recent decades.

Accepting tentatively Morison's basis of classification, but choosing other illustrations, we might name as our examples of industrialized nations, the United States and Japan, and of those that have not yet experienced the economic change, but are destined to that end, China, India, Africa and Latin-America.

From the standpoint of modern missionary enterprise and aspiration, the classification is somewhat disconcerting; a comparative chronological study discloses the fact that the industrialization of Japan, with those dire results in woman and child labor, long hours, ghastly housing conditions, tuberculosis and immorality, huge profiteering and seething labor unrest, has proceeded pari passu with the effort of the Church to Christianize Japan. It discloses the fact that under the very eyes of the missionaries who are toiling with audacious faith and amazing self-sacrifice to Christianize Africa and China and India and Latin-America, industrialization goes on apace—slipping up on us, as it were, in the night; here a factory and there a factory alongside of cottage industries and workshops; presently the old displaced, the new in full possession, like the proverbial camel crowding the hospitable Arab from his own tent.

THE discovery that missionary effort and industrialization are contemporary makes pertinent the question whether the one has not some vast responsibility toward the other. Are certain obligations imposed upon modern missions by developing economic situations in missionary countries? Have we neglected in Japan, are we in danger of neglecting in other countries, an aspect of the lives of peoples which is absolutely fundamental to their well-being? Especially, has the Church a Christian and scientific contribution to make to social progress?

Some further questions and suggested answers may clarify our subject. Are there, as some have thought, inescapable laws decreeing that all peoples must pass through the same economic stages?

Is the industrialization of the foreign nations in which we are interested desirable, even if not inevitable?

If the transition from handicraft to machine production is both inevitable and desirable, is it possible that the factory system might be accompanied by such thoroughgoing protection of labor as to escape the frightful human miseries which the United States and European countries and Japan have experienced?

Finally, is social control a mere dream of the sociologists, or is it possible for eager, energetic groups to lay hold of social forces and bend them in a desired direction?

The above questions may be answered with some degree of assurance in the light of recent social history, and recent study of social origins.

Sociologists agree that not all peoples have passed through the same economic stages, progressing from the hunting and fishing stage, for instance, through the pastoral and agricultural-handicraft to machine production. Quite certainly some have omitted one or another stage. Conceivably, then, India or China might pass from traditional agriculture and cottage industries to scientifically improved agriculture and handicraft—perhaps alongside of factory production for certain utilities requiring concentration; conceivably the very juxtaposition of tribal society and new industrial towns in South Africa delimit a new social situation which might result in some new economic type. Probably there are not inescapable economic laws determining the course that nations must pursue.

WHETHER industrialization is to be desired depends upon the viewpoint of the person seeking to answer the question. English and American business men enamored of the machine, and with eye fixed on the profits accruing from native resources, might answer in the affirmative. But certain thoughtful natives—and as good sportsmen in life's game, we should listen to native opinion regarding their own resources—are answering negatively. Some young Chinese now studying in this country are dreaming of the possibility of their industry omitting the capital-and-labor stage and passing direct from the old handicraft with its guild organization to a machine production that shall be co-operatively managed. There are native students in India, of whom Professor Radhakamal Mukerjee is an able exponent, who would have India retain and deliberately develop her indigenous cottage industries.

Again it would seem possible that industrialization, if it takes place, should be accompanied by labor protection from the first. Recent history presents some striking illustrations of deliberately and rapidly executed social changes such as the modernization of Japan, and the abolition of opium and of the old education system in China.

Finally the answer as to the possibility of social control lies before us in the activities of governments and business groups which have already turned the trick. Anyone who takes the pains to peruse the five large volumes of the report of the Indian Industrial Commission, for instance, will behold the British Government and British business at the task of industrializing India.

We may learn a lesson from modern business. "The children of this world," said one whose comments on life were ever trenchant, "are wiser in their generation than the children of light." Should the Church set itself to modify the economic development of peoples it would but be doing that which, as current history shows, can be done with impunity.

Here is an opportunity for adventure. Business is largely personal and selfish, seeking profit. The Church goes as a knight-errant, seeking the welfare of peoples. Business looks first at natural resources and, lusting after them, sees in natives cheap labor to be used in developing the resources. The Church looks first at the natives, recognizes them as worthy and precious, and considers natural resources as something to be used for the development of the peoples.

It may be objected that "Church" is used ideally here; that in reality the Church represents a cross-section of society; that a stream cannot rise higher than its source; that hence it is too much to expect, that the Church should enter upon an adventure of this sort. To which the answer might well be given, that the Church tends to gather into itself idealists and to generate idealism; that it was Christian idealism indeed which sent the Church out for the salvation of peoples before business went seeking wealth. Surely several generations of gallant missionary effort entitle the Church to a large place in the determination of the world's development.

Moreover a true picture of society—a real cross-section today—would reveal multitudes of people whose human aspirations revealed and then disappointed by the war can be reenlisted in a great enterprise. Shall the Church furnish the leadership? The war revealed a method—the use of propaganda. During the war it was used to exploit human emotions. It might be used by the Church to direct human emotions, to rouse Christian idealists—and those liberals and radicals who do not call themselves Christians, but who have passion for brotherhood—to venture forth upon a great new quest.

IT IS not our province here to indicate in detail methods of procedure. It would seem that Commissions of experts might be appointed to study the possibilities here indicated—a General Commission first, whose members should be men and women of economic knowledge and recognized insight into economic conditions. Such a commission might formulate general plans of advance. But later there should perhaps be a Commission for each country on which should sit natives and missionaries and expert economists to study native economic conditions, and to determine policies to be followed in influencing industrial development.

It is a scientific adventure, this, to which the Church might summon Christians. Sociologists write books and sections of books on social control. The Christian Church has a chance to practice social control. Fancy the interest with which one thousand years hence students of sociology (grown into a fairly exact science, with large contribution to social development) seeking social origins, studying social history, might discover the omission by certain twentieth century nations of a whole economic stage, might discover for instance that while certain countries—England, France, Germany, the United States, Japan and others—had passed from handicraft to machine production and the economic organization known as the capitalistic system, certain others perhaps India and China, had through the deliberate action of their people, worked out some new—and for them more appropriate—form of organization. And not alone, but with the co-operation of the idealists of other countries, with the co-operation for instance of the Christian churches of the United States.

No less is it a spiritual adventure. The indigenous arts and crafts of India have to the Indians a religious significance. It is the religion of the Indian craftsman, Mukerjee says, that gives his economic activities their tone and dignity and simplicity. There is an unmistakable religious appeal in the passionate resolutions of two successive native conferences in Madras—the Visvakarma Mahajana Conferences of April, 1915, and April, 1916—begging the government to take the necessary steps for the preservation of indigenous arts and industries peculiar to the community which are suffering extinction through competition.

It is interesting to know that some missions are already devoting themselves to the development of native industries. The work of the Salvation Army in India hand-loom weaving is notable. The Church of Scotland has a somewhat significant venture at Kalimpong where it has developed lace-work, embroidery, weaving, dyeing and silver work. The opportunity offered is indicated by Mr. Lionel Heath, Principal of the Mayo School of Art, Lahore, who, testifying before the Indian Industrial Commission, said: "I should like to see appreciated the fund of skilled and artistic taste, lying in most cases dormant in the Indian craftsman, to a great extent unspoiled even yet, but which is fast being lost or ruined."

It may be noted in passing that if the Church sets itself to influence economic development, it will find, as some missionaries, and especially as the Y. M. C. A. have found, a significant opening at the point of Cooperation and Co-operative Societies, some time since provided for by the government in its Co-operative Credits Acts.

The United States would not be the loser through the economic activities of its missionaries. Such effort might react favorably upon the monotonous, unspiritual machine production which has developed in the Occident under the spur of the lust for profit. When Charles Cuthbert Hall addressed groups of educated Indians on Christianity he told them that, making their own interpretation of Christianity they would give back to the West a richer religion. Perhaps the East may yet give back to the West a spiritualized industry.

IN THE meantime the question is a fair one whether the Church has been totally derelict in regard to economic conditions abroad, or whether a beginning has already been made. Particularly, is there a special agricultural work of Sam Higginbottom at Allahabad, India. Beyond this the imagination runs to an industrial type of missionary work which will actually have to do with the re-ordering of the world's economic life as a foundation for those spiritual values with which the Church has ever been concerned.

Several classifications of industrial missions have been suggested. They may be divided into Industrial Enterprise and Industrial Training. The former includes those missions which carry on business as such, both to give occupation to natives and to aid the mission financially. Such enterprise must meet the difficulties of management, the missionary often being untrained in business; of equipment, which is often expensive; of markets for securing materials used and disposing of articles made; difficulties arising from competition with workers outside and especially difficulties in maintaining Christian principles at the same time that business profit is sought.

The Old and the New in China. Above the women are weaving in age-old fashion, slow and tedious work, but are they worse off than the women cooped up all day before machines in the cotton-mills of Shanghai?

type of mission work that claims to have attacked the problem in even a small way.

Industrial Missions, the fourth in that list of more specialized activity which marks modern missionary effort—the others being evangelistic, educational and medical missions—might perhaps make that claim. It is not our purpose here either to defend or to criticize industrial missions as at present conducted, but rather to attempt to interpret them, for a purpose; to see whether in this type of missions we have an approach to the economic lives of the people.

If industrial missions offer the best approach to an important and neglected field, let us at once have more and far better equipped industrial missions. If it develops that this type of work does not touch the hem of the garment of our problem, let us, with such haste as accords with scientific procedure, turn ourselves to the development of a real mission to economic life in backward countries.

The term Industrial Missions is used somewhat loosely in missionary literature to describe any missions having industrial features as part of their regular missionary activity. These range all the way from those offering a little handwork, perhaps lace-making or carpentry or gardening, on up through those having somewhat more ambitious workshops and farms to such effort as the scientifically founded INDUSTRIAL training, by far the more significant division, defines itself. There are, however, several types of missionary industrial training. Many mission schools now offer handwork—manual training, domestic science, sloyd, etc.—in harmony with newer educational ideals, solely as a means to character development. But many schools aim to give real vocational training sometimes of a fairly thorough character resulting in qualified technicians; oftener of a simple type merely training the pupils to work under the direction of others. A distinction may be made also between the schools that teach trades and those that give agricultural training.

Industrial enterprise and industrial training overlap. The schools in Africa that claim to specialize in vocational training are obliged to consider the problem of conducting the workshops with regard to business principles, and to wrestle with the difficulty of disposing of products, and the very serious question of competition with white skilled labor; while missions which are primarily of a business character, still, through apprenticeship, teach various trades.

President Faunce in his "Social Aspects of Foreign Missions" graphically distinguishes between "an industrial school which aims not at making tiles or cotton cloth, but at making boys and girls into men and women, and a real factory or business whose service is constantly tested by the market value of its output. Both may be conducted for Christian ends, but a school with a regular deficit may be a great success, while a Christian factory with a recurring deficit must soon close its doors. The school wastes many logs in the carpenter's shop, and much clay in brick-making, without regret, since it asks no visible return. The factory aims at 'philanthropy and five per cent.'"

A MORE adequate understanding of industrial missions comes through the psychological approach. What situations called into being this type of work?

Industrial missions were not first a missionary policy and then a program wrought out by missionaries sent for that purpose. Rather they were at first the attempt made by resourceful missionaries to meet the economic obstacles against which their spiritual effort ever tended to break itself. Without exception—unless the manual training for character development as part of the curriculum of the school be an exception—the raison d'être of industrial missions is economic. Thus the factories and weaving establishments of the Basel Missions in Malabar, India, were developed to supply work to natives who were cast out by their own people when they embraced Christianity. The Protestant Episcopal Church at Quadalajara, Mexico, added industrial features to inculcate the idea of the dignity of labor; finding that it was developing "an aristocracy of white hands and polished shoes and high collars" it moved the St. Andres School to a farm and turned it into an industrial and agricultural school. The De Laney Self-Help Plan, maintained by the National Baptist Convention at its Bible Industrial Mission Academy near Hartford, Liberia, was developed to enable pupils to pay their way in school. It receives from friends in America braid, wire, flowers, and ribbons which are used by the students in hat-making, while goats and chickens, and many kinds of fruit-trees furnish other work. The elaborate scheme of afforestation developed by Joseph Bailie on Purple Mountain near Nanking grew out of the necessity of providing for famine sufferers. Higginbottom's work at Allahabad had as part of its motivation the desire to develop a self-supporting church.

Each of the above is fairly representative and illustrates a practical reason for the development of industrial missions. The late A. Woodruff Halsey in his attractive booklet "By Hammer and Hand"

A Problem with the Younger Boy

YOU will remember, perhaps, that I said my family consisted of my wife and three children, a boy taking a college course, a younger boy and a girl in the High School, and all of them living at home.

I think I said that we all belonged to the church and the Sunday school, and that I had a comfortable business which kept me fairly busy to make my income of $3,500 a year.

I should have said—but perhaps you have already found it out—that up to the time I began to make these confessions, I was so busy making a living that I had let my wife, who is a person of great wisdom and good judgment, do most of the bringing up of the children. But a number of things had occurred to make me think that the father had something to do as well as the mother in training children in the home, and two matters that had to do with the younger boy, emphasized this fact again with me. Thinking that a good many fathers probably face the same problems with their young boys, I am telling about these two incidents, and perhaps it may help you as it helped me, as well as the boy.

His name, by the way is John, which is an easy name to speak and spell and write, and he has his own room, as each one of the children has, and I seldom go into it, except once in a while to see if he is keeping good his promise to his mother to keep everything neat. But the other morning as I was going down the hall, his door was open and I stepped in just to give a look around, and I was pleased to notice that everything seemed to be all right. The boy is athletic and I couldn't help seeing the display of tennis rackets and Indian clubs and boxing gloves and baseball bats scattered around, not in slovenly fashion, but neatly arranged on the wall and by his desk.

I WAS going out, with a feeling of pride in the boy's evident good faith with his mother, when I saw on the top of his desk an advertisement of a moving picture show. It was so large and conspicuous that it caught my eye and I went up closer to read it, and this is what I read:

"AT THE DIANA THEATER! TODAY, FRIDAY AND SATURDAY! COME EARLY.
"NOT FOR LITTLE CHILDREN.
"LET US HAVE WINE, WOMEN, MIRTH AND LAUGHTER." SERMONS AND SODA WATER THE DAY AFTER."—BYRON.

"On his twenty-first birthday the IMP went on a wild tear.

"He sowed his wild oats in one wild night.

"Come and see how he did it.

"Passion ruled.

"If you haven't reached twenty-one, here's a surprise, a thrill and a jolt. A night of passion! Come early!"

There was some more, but what I read was enough to give me a "jolt" if not a "thrill." There was a picture with the advertisement, of such a character that I knew if John's mother saw it she would sink on her knees at the boy's bedside and pray to her good God to save him from shame. So I took the advertisement off the desk and put it in my pocket, and as I went down town to my $3,500 business, I am ready to confess to you that I was angry, so angry and disturbed at what I had found in the younger boy's room that I made several mistakes in adding up some important figures on the adding-machine.

And as I left the store and started for home I was not settled in my mind as to the best way to meet this problem, and thought at first I would pass it on to my wife. Then I felt ashamed to do that, for it was what I had been doing all my life up to this time, and it was beginning to look rather cowardly and weak on my part. So after supper, just as John was getting ready to go out—"somewhere," he had rather vaguely said—I asked him to come upstairs with me to my den, a small room off the hall where I used to go for an after-supper smoke before I stopped in the bargain which, perhaps, you may remember I made with the older boy. I use the den now to read in and do not miss my cigars half so much as I was afraid I was going to.

I ASKED the boy to sit down, and then, acting on the habit which is a characteristic one in our family, of coming at once to the point, I took out the "movie" advertisement and handed it over to him and said:

"Is this what you were going to tonight, when you said you were going 'somewhere'?"

He grew very red, but answered promptly, "Yes, sir."

"Don't you know that is no decent kind of a show to go to?" I said losing my temper and speaking pretty loud.

The Fifth of a Series of Delightful Articles on Intimate Home Topics

By A MERE MAN

"Everybody goes. The best people go."

"What 'best' people?"

"All of them."

"Name some."

And the boy did what I asked. And he named about a third of all the church members it seemed to me.

"Do any of them ever go out when they see a picture like that?" I asked pointing to the advertisement.

The boy grew very red again, but he answered with a laugh that would almost have broken his mother's heart if she had heard it, "I never saw them."

"Have you been going to these shows right along when we supposed you were at the high-school gym or at the library?" I said, and I must have spoken and looked rather stern, for the boy's face went white.

"Yes," he said in a low tone, and I was glad he had not lied to me.

"What would your mother say?"

At that he looked really distressed, but after a moment he looked up and said, "If the show is so bad, why do the best people keep going?"

I confess the boy's question was not easy to answer. I did not try. As a matter of fact, I am one of a few men in my town who don't care for moving pictures, and I had not really known much about the character of them until this incident revealed them. The fact that the boy had been going right along, when we thought he was attending to his high-school athletics or his studies, was a very disturbing thing to me, and I knew his mother would break her heart over it. But while I was brooding over it, the boy said rather lightly, I thought, for one who had been found out in a deception:

"Why don't you go to the show, father, and see if it is as bad as you think? Sometimes the advertisements are not like the pictures inside."

IT SOUNDED like a challenge, and I rose right up and said, "We'll go right down."

We went down stairs, and I said to my wife, "I'm going out with John for a while."

She seldom asks any questions when I speak like that, only she did look surprised, as she said, "Will you be out late?"

"I think not," I said, and then somewhat to my surprise, for John is not a demonstrative boy, he went up to his mother and put his arm about her neck and kissed her.

She looked pleased at that, and the picture that followed me clear into the picture house was the picture of my wife's look as she returned the boy's kiss and said, "You will be in good company with your father."

When we went in to the theater we found it nearly full, and by the time the lights were turned down every seat was occupied. Before that, I had time to look around and check up on the boy's statement that the best people went. I could see any number of our church folks, and three or four ministers.

There was a series of educational and travel views that were very instructive and interesting. I found myself looking at them with real interest. Then the story of the "imp" came along.

I am not exaggerating when I say that some of the scenes in this picture were simply horrible in their vulgarity and suggestiveness. I had noticed that before the pictures were shown there had been a sentence thrown on the screen saying that it had been passed by the State Board of Censors. I could not help wondering, after seeing a few of the scenes, what kind of pictures would have been censored by the Board.

Well, the longer I sat there and saw things that burned into my memory like hot coals, and thought of the times my boy and thousands of other boys and girls all over America had seen such pictures, the more indignant I grew, and I began to look around, to see if any one was going to get up and remonstrate or object. But everyone seemed to be getting the advertised "jolts" and "thrills," and quite pleased with them.

But suddenly the whole thing seemed to me to be so horrible that I took the boy by the arm and said out loud, so loud that several people looked around in surprise, "Let us get out of here!"

WE WALKED over several people's feet to get out, at least I did, and when we reached the lobby, I asked one of the doorkeepers where the manager was.

He told me to go up into the operator's room. I did so and found the manager, and told him why I was leaving.

He looked very much surprised, when I told him I did not consider his show a decent thing to look at.

"Is any one else going out?" he said.

"Not that I know of. But I am."

"Sorry," he said. "But the best people are here. This is what they like. It crowds the house."

I couldn't think of anything else to say and went down into the lobby and joined the boy, who had waited for me.

We did not talk much on the way home. Only, once the boy said, "Are you going to tell mother?"

"Yes, I am," I answered somewhat shortly, for I still felt indignant at what I had seen.

So when we came into the house, and my wife asked if we had had a good time, after expressing her surprise to see us so soon, I told her the entire story.

The thing that cut her the most was John's deceiving us. He broke down over that, and got down on his knees and begged his mother's forgiveness. And I shall never forget the look on her face when she stroked the boy's head, and whispered something to him that I did not hear. And he said something to her which I did not hear.

AFTER he had gone upstairs, my wife and I had a long talk over the matter. She was much distressed over it.

But when we left off discussing the matter, there was a smile on my wife's face, and I ventured to ask her,

"What did John say to you just now?"

"He said he did want to please me. And he promised me not to go to the picture show without telling either you or me, and would not go at all, if we objected, as we shall, to such pictures. Besides, he said spring was here and he had much rather give the time to tennis in the long evenings."

That pleased me greatly.

"You must get interested in the boy's outdoor life," my wife said a little timidly. "Don't you think you could go with him once in a while over to the tennis—"

She stopped right there as she sometimes does, without finishing, and her hint led to the other interesting experience I had with the boy, which I shall have to tell you the next time. But I have thought several times since that night at the show that the boy made that promise about the shows to his mother. I wonder why he didn't make it to me. Come to think of it, I don't wonder much after all.

Family Altar Suggestions

By DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

IF THE entire family is in the habit of gathering at the breakfast-table, let the Father and Mother see that all the children are seated in orderly and quiet fashion. Then let the whole family repeat the Lord's Prayer in concert. After that, if the children in the family are taught the day before—as in many families they are—let each one recite a Bible verse, in turn. After that, let the whole family say the following grace or thanks, this old Moravian form:

"For these and all Thy gifts of love,
We give Thee thanks and praise;
Look down our Father, from above,
And bless us all our days."

Or another form of thanks is the following:

"Feed us, Dear Lord, we humbly pray
With bread of life from day to day;
And may we give, for Thy dear sake,
To others, that which Thou dost break."

In cases where the head of the household can offer his own prayer asking for the day's blessing, such a prayer, if made with simplicity and directness, will have great influence on the entire family circle. It should be brief, and spoken in reverent and simple language which children can understand, and may be followed by the Lord's Prayer, all joining.

In many homes the habit prevails of reading the whole Bible through by course, each member of the family reading two verses out of the chapter for the day. In other homes a very helpful service is found in choosing some special topic and using it for several weeks or months. Others have used a Gospel or an epistle, reading it entirely through, a chapter or a part of a chapter at a time.

Whatever form the Altar may take, remember these simple rules: Let the prayers, read or spoken, be brief, simple, reverent, full of thanks. Make the service joyful, not solemn; reverent, not gloomy or sanctimonious.

If music is possible, let the hymn be one of glad praise and hope. In many homes the music at the family devotions is the part the children most enjoy.

Teach the Lord's Prayer to be said carefully. Do not hurry through it. Let one of the children learn to say the words of grace or thanks as his own part in the service.

Let the Bible, in some form, be the text-book.

If guests are in the Home, invite them to sit in the circle.

Strictly Disputatious Emily

Her Suitor Tries a New Tack

By PAUL EVERMAN

Illustrated by Ann Brockman

She smiled sadly. "I like you, Alan—sometimes I think I—I love you. If we were young it would be different."

LET it be understood in the beginning that Emily Caswell was not old-maidish, even though she was confessedly an old maid. She was not lank and ungainly, nor inquisitive, nor gossipy, nor querulous; neither was she frail and negative, with a shrinking manner and a fluttering little voice. She was but a desirable little woman whose primness was womanliness, whose plump little hands were helpful, who could cry for sympathy and laugh to cheer.

But tonight she twisted the plump hands in obvious discontent as she confided to Alan Doane. And Doane, sitting quietly in the high-backed willow rocker in which he had sat at least one evening a week for the past five years, watched her hungrily—as he had watched her for these same five years.

"I used to have a mind of my own!" Emily was exclaiming vexatiously. "It used to be that I didn't knuckle under to people unless they were in the right. But now—Oh, Alan, I'm getting so disgusted with myself!"

Doane, who, with his bulging brow and modicum of graying hair, shone nakedly upward from his red, puckered neck, was mildly surprised.

"Why, Emily, what's the matter?"

"Oh, I'm too agreeable, too nice! Just because people come in to buy my hats, I can't forget that they're my customers; and I let them peddle gossip and have their own way about everything."

"For instance—"

"Well, take Myra Clemmons. She came in yesterday to look at my hats. She tried on every one I had and finally picked out one she liked—this one"—Emily turned to the other side of the room where a dozen or more hats were perched jauntily on their slim stands, and pointed out a blue velvet one, gay with dainty bits of green ribbon. "I priced it to her, and—and—oh, she was just about insulting! Said it was cheap and poorly made and that she could get one twice as good at Carsdale for half the price."

DOANE eyed his chunky, calloused hands thoughtfully and declared, "I never did care much for Myra Clemmons."

"Oh, I never did either, for that matter. And it makes me so mad to think that I let her tell me what she did—and it wasn't so!—without a word of denial. But that wasn't the worst. While she was here she got to insinuating things about Lizzie Willetts—just because Lizzie is trying to fix herself up dainty and clean after being starved and mistreated most of her life. Why, Myra even intimated that poor little Lizzie had been encouraging attentions from Lafe Billers and Charley Higham and—and that crowd! Oh, I can't tell you all she said, Alan!"

"She's an old cat!" growled Alan, whose manner was as blunt as his nose.

"Yes, she is! But think: I set there and didn't say a word in denial! All I said was 'Well' and 'Is that so?' I couldn't even speak a good word for little Lizzie, who needs friends if anybody does. Oh, it was sinful for me to act that way!"

"I reckon you ain't such an awful sinner, Emily."

"I am too! It's sinful to be so agreeable and side in with what everybody says. I didn't use to be that way. But now this house is getting to be a regular gossip shop. People don't come here to buy hats as much as to spread scandal. And I don't deny their talk even when I know it's all lies. I'm getting tired of it, Alan. I want to have a mind of my own, and I'm going to have." Emily jerked back in her chair, her face flushed and determined.

"Why," said Doane with a surprised glance, "I wouldn't get all worked up over a little thing like this."

"It's not a little thing. It's a question of right and wrong. . . ." And Emily rocked furiously.

Suddenly Doane jerked his chair over beside her.

"Emily," he said bluntly, looking straight into her softening gray eyes, "I'm goin' to ask you again: won't you marry me?"

A plump little hand stole over and pressed against his calloused ones.

"Alan, I'm sorry. I hate to hurt you. But it just can't be. I'm sorry."

"But, girl, I'll make you happy!" he cried huskily. "I will! I'm not good enough for you—I'm only a section boss—I ain't got a great deal. But I've got a little, an' what I've got's yours. You're all alone, an' I'm all alone. There's no sense of us goin' on like this, just bein' together once a week when we could be together all the time. Don't you think you could be happy with me, Emily?"

SHE was silent, staring far beyond him, past the neat array of multi-colored hats, through the thin walls, into the grayfulness of memory.

"I 'spect I pester you," he went on, almost vehemently, "goin' on like this an' askin' you again an' again, never takin' 'no' for an answer. I 'spect you get tired o' hearin' the same question over an' over. But I want you—I been wantin' you an' hopin' for the last five years. I've dreamed an' thought an' planned how it'd be if you'd only say 'yes.' I've thought about a home of our own, where you could raise all the chickens an' flowers you wanted, where I could come home every evenin' after a hard day's work an' find you waitin' for me, where day after day we'd be happy together. I'd have something worth while to work for then. It wouldn't be a boardin' house I'd have to go to; it'd be a home! Emily—Emily, don't you think you could be happy with me?"

Emily turned slowly to him, her eyes shining brightly. "Why—why—you can talk, Alan!"

"Talk? It's all I think about! I've got it all pictured in my mind just how our home'd be. . . if you'd only say 'yes,' Emily!"

"I'm sorry, Alan," she said wistfully. "I'm sorry. But—"

"But what?"

"Oh—we're too old!" The words rushed out.

"Too old? Pshaw!"

"But we are! Even now, when people see us together they laugh at us behind our backs. Haven't you heard them—the kids giggling at us—"

"Let 'em talk! What do we care! If we'd get married they'd get used to it an' stop their gigglin'."

She smiled sadly. "I like you, Alan—sometimes I think I—I love you. If we were young it'd be different. But now—oh, we're too old to think about it!"

"I'm only forty-two, an' you're—"

She blushed a merry red and laughed, "Never you mind!" Then seriously, "But don't let's talk about it any more. Please! I'd like to make you happy, and—and I'm thankful that you love me. If we were younger it'd be different. But—" She shook her head in gentle finality.

And Doane, as had been his habit for four years and more, gave up his pleas.

FROM the tiny porch of her frail cottage, which gleamed white under the rising moon, she bade him good night and watched his stocky form swing down the narrow path, his tramping feet swishing and crunching among the brittle, autumn-tinted maple leaves. She watched him turn onto the sidewalk that flanked Elmhurst's wide, dusty main street, listened pensively to the solid footfalls growing fainter and fainter.

"Poor boy!" she murmured. "He's so lonely—and so patient!"

Then she went slowly into the house, locked the doors, pulled down the window shades, and peered fearfully beneath her bed (the bravest of women do it).

Ready for bed, she paused before her mirror and looked searchingly into her own shining eyes.

"He's good!" she breathed—"so good!" And with a quick puff she blew out the light and scurried away to bed.

During the following week Emily thought often of Alan Doane. "Wonder what Alan's doing," she would wonder, and would supply the thought with a mental picture: In the morning he was standing stockily on the tool-littered handcar, with his helpers pumping energetically, on the way to work; at noon he was sitting on the grass along the right-of-way, fishing out his cold lunch from a battered dinner-bucket, his head bare, his shirt collar open; in the afternoon he was shoveling gravel, or dragging a rotten tie from beneath the glossy-topped rails, or supervising the work of his men.

And when she wasn't thinking of Alan, and working busily at her hats or selling them to picayunish customers at a ridiculously small profit, Emily was berating herself savagely. Was she spineless? she asked herself scornfully; and a foreign glint spiced the gray eyes. Well, she wasn't going to be any more. Poor little Lizzie Willetts! But she would defend Lizzie next time she got a chance—see if she wouldn't! Just let Myra Clemmons—or anybody else!—come, and she'd find out. . . .

ON FRIDAY evening the lank figure of a woman flew furiously out onto the tiny porch of the frail little house, and down the path to the sidewalk, with never an unbending of neck nor a single glance backward.

Myra Clemmons had come and departed.

"Oh, I told her!" cried Emily to Alan the following Sunday night. "She come nosing 'round and tried on all my hats again. Oh, I was just itching for her to give me a chance to say something. And when she started complaining about the hats being so poor and high, I just lit into her! Yes, I did! I told her that if she didn't like my hats she needn't try 'em on, stretching 'em all out of shape and getting 'em all mussed up and dirty. I told her I wasn't so very particular 'bout having her business anyhow. Oh, I was just getting wound up good and proper, and it was just on the tip of my tongue to tell her what a fine example of Christian charity she was to be spreading scandal about poor Lizzie Willetts, when she jumped up and run out the front door without saying a word. She was scared of me, Alan! She was scared of me!"

Doane chuckled. "I'd 'a' been scared myself, I'm thinkin'."

"Well, I'll tell her a lot more if I get a good chance. I'm tired of agreeing with people. They think more of you if you speak up your own mind once in a while.

"Take Mrs. Hollister: She's generally nice and likable, but she made me mad the other day, and I told her a thing or two. She was blaming Charlie Mennick for running away from home. Said he was a lazy, good-for-nothing kid that would land in the reform school yet. And I just up and told her that if I had been him I would have run away long ago, with his father beating him and scolding him from morning till night, never giving him a cent of spending money and treating him more like a dog than like a son. I told Mrs. Hollister that she knew as well as I did that it was all old Mennick's fault. And finally she owned up that I was right about the whole business. Think of it, Alan! She owned up! It was her that agreed with me!"

DOANE let out an uproarious laugh and cried, "Well, say, what's come over you? You're gettin' to be a regular terror, goin' 'round with a chip on your shoulder all the time. How many more scraps did you have last week?"

Emily bobbed her head valiantly. "Just one more. After prayer meeting Wednesday night old Perry Ostler walked up to me and stuck his nose into my face, just like he's got the habit of doing, and says: 'Well, I see ye had comp'ny Sunday night. I see a light in your front room when I went past. Alan Doane, I reckon.' And then he laughed in that silly way of his."

"Well," I says, and I looked him right straight in the eye, 'what about it?'

"That got him! And he begun apologizing, but I didn't give him any satisfaction. The old scamp! I've been wanting to sting him for a long time. He's always prying into other folks' affairs."

His smooth, red face crinkled with grin, Doane studied her minutely. This was a new Emily. She had been desirable before, but now she was bewitching. There was spice to her: the snap to her bearing, the battle glint to the gray eyes, the excitement bloom of her warm cheeks. She was almost pretty.

Suddenly he sprang up, his face aglow, and stretched a hungry arm toward her.

"Emily," he began impetuously, "won't you—'" "Keep still, Alan!" Her tone was so foreignly sharp that he winced. "Don't start that tonight! It's nine o'clock. You go on home now."

He tried to smile, scratched his pink head in amazement, and finally escaped out the door much after the manner of Myra Clemmons, save for a hastily flung "good-night."

THE week fled with Emily fairly strutting in her regained independence, which she was now agile to flash at the slightest opportunity. The battle glint in her gray eyes had apparently come to stay. It was there while her plump little hands were busily fashioning braids and ribbons into hat trimmings, while she was scattering feed to her friendly chickens, while she was raking and sweeping up the yellow-and-red maple leaves from her square patch of front yard, while she was demonstrating to her customers—especially while she was demonstrating to her customers!

Thursday evening came, and she breathed a glad sigh as, alone, she tucked a soft pillow at her back and picked up a neglected book, pleasurably anticipative of a quiet evening's reading.

A creak and a shuffle outside aroused her. She turned and saw Alan Doane peering in at her, his bald head craned around the edge of the door.

She jumped up. "Why, hello, Alan. Won't you come in?"

Doane stepped inside, a determined swing to his bunched shoulders, a reckless gleam of excitement in his usually steady eyes.

"Been down to Bates's store," he explained with unfathomable carelessness. "Thought I'd stop in a minute." He chuckled: "Thought mebbe you'd had another scrap with Myra Clemmons. Wanted to hear about it if you had."

Emily flung her book aside, and her face lighted with unalloyed pleasure.

"Alan," she cried, "that woman had the nerve to come back here Tuesday and ask to look at my hats again! And I just lit into her and ripped her up one side and down the other, about Lizzie Willetts and everything else I could think of. And then—"

She paused triumphantly.

"Yeh," he encouraged.

"And then she apologized for the way she'd acted, and bought the best hat I had! What do you think about that?"

"Didn't you apologize to her for losin' your temper?"

"What? Apologize to her? I should say not! It's other people that are apologizing to me nowadays! I tell you, Alan, I've found out that people have a lot more respect for me if I show a little spunk occasionally. Now just the other day Mrs. Kinsey come in to gossip, bothering me in my work like she always does. She started out by finding fault with the preacher. Said that he didn't earn his money because he ain't a good mixer and because he don't spend enough time calling on the church members. And—"

"He ain't much of a mixer, Emilv," interjected Doane.

"LISTEN here, Alan Doane, I'll tell you just what you can just lump it! What kind of a preacher can we expect to get if we only pay him seven hundred dollars a year, with living as high as it is? We get the best we can for seven hundred, and then some people are ashamed of him because his clothes is shiny and threadbare, and some find fault because he don't go out in the country afoot—he ain't even got a bicycle!—visiting his parishioners all the time. I admit

When Someone Smiles Back

NOT very long ago I wrote an article about the unsmiling people I saw one evening in a subway train. I told, rather in detail, how their lack of friendliness to passers-by had made me unhappy. And I told how their frowns had caused my heart to ache. And I called the article "When No One Smiles Back."

The article was published in due time. And when it had been out for a day or two I began to get letters from pen-and-ink friends—friends I have never seen and will, probably, never see. And the letters were so full of thoughtfulness and love that each one of them was like a handclasp from a well-wisher. And as I read them I told myself:

"I'll never again say that there's a time when no one smiles back—never. For I get letters every day—and have for years—from splendid people who are smilers!"

These are some of the letters that have come to me in the last few weeks:

FROM Washington, D. C., I received this message: "I just had to talk to you a few minutes after reading your article 'When No One Smiles Back.' You spoke of those severe ladies draining some of the joy of living from your soul. All because they did not understand. I believe it is possible for all the people who exist to have understanding hearts (that is, spiritual understanding) if all will pray—'Please, God, give me an understanding heart.' It is a gift from God and one He stands ready to give to all. There is something about that prayer that changes everyone who tries it. Many suffer terribly in gaining this spiritual understanding, but it is worth it. And there can be no millennium until all have this understanding. Help it along in one of your articles in Christian Herald, will you?"

And this letter is from far-away Nebraska:

"I was born in Brooklyn in the first year of the Civil War. My mother was a member of the Dutch Reformed Church at Bedford Avenue and Clymer Street, and of course we attended the Sunday school. Elbert S. Porter, D.D., was our minister; George W. Bungay, superintendent of the Sunday school; Emma B. Thursby, our soprano; and Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, teacher of a very large infant class. I remember how active she was and what pretty bonnets she always wore. In centennial year (1876) we moved out West to what we thought was the outskirts of civilization and as we waited at midnight in the little depot at Fort Wayne, Ind., I expected to see Indians come in at the door. Later we went to Chicago where I was married. Then, in 1887, with our four little children, we emigrated to what was really the far West, Cherry County, where we still live. We took up land twelve miles from the small cattle-shipping town of Wood Lake. Everything was so primitive—no 'phones, or autos to shorten the long twelve miles over bad roads—the mail sometimes delayed two or three weeks, and the teaching of the children's lessons oft-times while at work in the kitchen.

But, oh, we learned for the first time what good neighbors really meant. In sickness there would be sympathy and help, and in health the monthly getting together in the different homes with our families for preaching services—with such wonderful dinners afterward to which we all contributed, and the appetites that the pure air and the long rides made so keen. Oh, those years of our early life here were filled with experiences that I would not have missed for anything—hard, many of them, but these are the things that develop character.

"Today, after nearly thirty-four years in the West I can thank God that He guided us here. Our children are all in homes of their own and we have nine bright, healthy grandchildren to bless our old age."

AND this comes from even farther away, for a little girl in the Canary Islands wrote it:

"Perhaps you will be interested to know that you have a little friend in the far-away Canary Islands. It has been more than a year since we landed in the port of the beautiful city of Santa Cruz, and began our work as missionaries among these people.

"I am fourteen years old, and live with my father, mother, sister and brother; both my brother and sister are older than myself. We left our home in the United States and came here because there are so many people here who need to know the Gospel story, and so few to tell them.

"The language they speak is Spanish, and since I am able to speak it, the meeting for children has been put in my charge, every Thursday night. Since you love little children and understand their hearts, I just wish you could meet with us and hear them sing the hymns and repeat their Bible verses. We are learning the Beatitudes, and five of the boys and girls are able to repeat them all from memory, as well as many other verses. Most of the children are very poor, and many of them are ragged and dirty, but their dear little faces are bright and friendly, and I love them very dearly.

"I am sending you a snapshot of myself and my little Spanish friend, Agueda, who has been a great help to me in the language, and who is the leader among the girls in our children's meetings. Will you not pray with me that she may be saved and become a missionary to her own people?"

THIS letter came from Indiana, with a box of wild flowers:

"I did a little gypsying this morning and started some flowers to you as a result of my trip. Do you want to go with me as I gather them? Well, first we went out through the gate into the back barn lot, past the straw shed and down the lane to the woods. Our Maltese cat went with us every step of the way, often talking to us in cat language saying, 'purr yeau, yeau, yeau.' Our first treasure was a bit of moss (to form a bed for the flowers) which we call tree moss on account of its resemblance to small fir trees. We found several other varieties of moss, too. It had been raining this morning, so most of the flowers had partially closed, except our brave little violets—both the yellow and the blue (I couldn't find any of the white ones).

"Next we found some sprigs of wild plum, and one of haw buds, a bunch of the true anemone, some false-rue anemones, sweet williams, spring beauties, cut-leaf tooth-wort, dutchman's breeches (couldn't find any squirrel corn, and they smell so sweet), a red trillium, some fern leaves, a may-apple in bud, and several yellow dog-tooth violets. One of the leaves of these had forced its way through a dead leaf, determined to get up somehow, so we left the dead leaf on it; and when we got back to the house we went out into the orchard and picked a few apple blossoms and tucked them in, too.

"It was sweet and damp in the woods this morning. A cardinal kept whistling, 'Pretty year, pretty year; cheer, cheer, cheer, cheer,' and a noisy mocking-bird kept the woods ringing with a perfect medley of bird-land imitations. Even the frogs in the pond in the corner seemed nearly to burst their throats, they 'purled' so loudly. But we couldn't stay very long, as we knew it would hurry us to get the flowers packed before the postman arrived."

AND this gallant little letter came from up in New York State:

"I have just been reading 'Concerning the Little Tragedies,' and began straightway to wonder if anything I could write would be a help to any person afflicted with deafness. I myself have that terrible affliction; but thank God I think I have about overcome it. What would the first lady you wrote about think if she was so deaf she could not hear her daughter play the piano in the same room with her? It would not help matters with me if people should speak in a louder tone. And yet I can sit here this evening and smell the odor from a beautiful pot of flowers my son sent me. I also have prepared a dinner for the same son; and have gone to morning service with my fifteen-year-old daughter (and not a word of the service did I hear, nor of the singing). But I saw the flowers, and I also enjoyed having my son (who lives away) come home to my dinner.

"I wish I could tell that lady to begin to count the blessings (if she has not already done so) and to never mind if she doesn't hear all that is said. Live above the little tragedy of deafness; and as I say this I realize it is a very great tragedy. For so many times, one could be so much more useful, if one could hear. I often think I would like to visit the sick; or go and call on a lonely neighbor; but no. There looms a barrier that cannot be easily broken. But I can work for my little grandchildren and others, and sing softly to myself while doing so. And I can remember, and be thankful, that I have known the time when I could hear distinctly; so I know all the sounds in my memory; and that is better than having been born deaf."

Oh, friends of mine, after reading these letters, do you wonder that I can say, "There's never a time when no one smiles!"

Railing at Prohibition

EVER since its enactment, Prohibition has been subjected to misrepresentation. Nobody need be surprised at the loud claims of the liquor people voiced in some of the secular dailies that ought to have a higher regard for the truth than attempt to show that Prohibition has broken down in its enforcement. Nothing could be farther from the facts than this statement which has been emphasized in some journal that ought to be in better business. The Christian Herald, however, is in a position to give authoritatively and without fear of contradiction, the actual situation at the present time.

In New York City, the stronghold of the rum traffic in America, where Prohibition is more difficult than anywhere else, the problem of enforcement is being successfully carried out. For the first time since the settlers landed at the foot of Manhattan Island, almost all of the public drinking-places of the city have been closed Sunday and every day. Police Commissioner Enright has asked for more policemen to help him in his gigantic task, which the authorities have not yet granted; but he declares that if the additional force is not furnished him, he will enforce the state prohibitory law with the men he has at his disposal.

It is a boast of the underworld that the courts are so choked that prohibition is a failure, but this is based upon a misunderstanding of the real facts. Before the Methodist Preachers' meeting on May 23, the Acting District Attorney of New York County stated that while he had asked the Board of Estimate for a large number of helpers to try his prohibition cases, and was fearful that the help would not be given him, he intended to have the help, if necessary, by volunteer legal service, and that the Governor had promised to furnish such assistance in the increase of judges as would relieve the congestion of the courts that interfered with the law enforcement. Governor Miller and the municipal administration of New York City intend to make the greatest city of the world dry and the Empire State also dry.

It may be a difficult task to enforce the Volstead law, yet it will not be nearly so difficult as it was to put the Eighteenth Amendment into the Constitution of the United States or the Volstead act through Congress for its enforcement. The Federal and State authorities are bound to be true to their oath, and to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment.

It is becoming more and more clear that strong drink has been the cause of a very large proportion of the crimes committed in this country. This statement has been derided and denied by the wets, but statistics now overwhelmingly prove it to be true. It is equally true of crimes in our large cities as well as in sparsely settled country districts. According to a dispatch in the Louisville Courier-Journal of May 16, of thirty-two murder cases tried by a circuit judge in Kentucky, twenty-nine were directly attributable to strong drink. Wherever Prohibition is fairly enforced, crime dwindles. To permit the traffic to live anywhere in our land is to lay upon ourselves the reproach of blood guiltiness—a responsibility from which every decent citizen must shrink.

The liquor people, who owe their overthrow largely to their self-deception, need not imagine that there is any weakness in administration that will save them from the wreckage which the people have visited upon them. The laying off of two-thirds of the Prohibition force by the Federal government has heartened the wets and discouraged some of the more timid dries; but a bill has just been introduced in Congress appropriating $200,000 for the payment of the 700 men laid off, and their early reinstatement is assured. The apparent wide-open conditions in some parts of the country are merely a passing incident—a temporary phase in the great battle, in which the forces of righteousness are going forward to victory.

Old York

THE United States census figures, giving the foreign-born white population in what is called New York, reveal a startling condition in the largest city of America.

There are in New York today 1,989,216 foreign-born persons, over 15 per cent. of the entire population of that city. Of this number there are 479,481 Russians, 388,427 Italians, 202,833 Irish, 193,559 Germans, 145,257 Poles, and 126,447 Austrians. There are thirty nationalities in New York, exclusive of those from Canada and South America.

New York is often called the melting-pot of the world. In the melting process, how far will the children of these foreign-born Russians, Italians, Germans and Poles flow into the mold of well-made, useful, safe, hard-working, moral, steady Americans?

New York contains old-world thought, old-world superstition, old-world race feeling, old-world religions, old-world habits, old-world hatreds and old-world attachments.

In what degree can New York make this old world new?

In a generation from now, in what degree will these nearly 2,000,000 foreign-born become assimilated into the new world? Will New York finally become Old York, or will she be able to make the old into the new?

The Literature of Gloom

WHAT may be justly called "The Literature of Gloom" is having its innings as it always has in periods of international friction and unsettlement. In post-war times it is especially productive. We are overwhelmed with books of the type that sketches the future and the practical control of the seas and the world's commerce by ourselves and Japan while Europe, shorn of its age-long leadership, follows the fate of the old Roman empire in dwindling to the status of a group of petty creditor states, the financial center having shifted from London to New York. These forecasts by French, German and other authors cater to minds predisposed to regard them as the result of inspiration.

To the normal mind, however, they hold no voice of authority. The average man who keeps in touch with the world movement sees a silver lining to the storm cloud and images the future from the standpoint of a wholesome optimism. He sees France's industries reviving, England filled with hopes of speedy settlement of all her outstanding troubles, and even Germany buckling stoutly to the task of meeting her war engagements. He sees Silesia and Poland nearing a pacific settlement and Japan giving no evidence of nursing world-disturbing ambitions, but rather striving for peace and incidentally for time to attend to difficult home problems. Even Russia's madness seems to be giving place to more rational conditions. In a word, the world's brainstorm is clearing off and its peoples are a wiser if poorer group of nations.

As far as the old "European superiority," in the financial and commercial sense, is concerned, the average man here or abroad looks forward hopefully if not confidently to the future. In the years to come and under new and, let us hope, better auspices, every nation will have a new opportunity to take the place to which its own efforts will entitle it in the finance and commerce of the world. If peace prevail and armaments are reduced all will have equal advantages for development in proportion to their needs.

This we believe is the judgment of the sanest observers. The wreck which began seven years ago is already proving capable of restoration. Today the eyes of all the nations are looking peaceward, where alone security lies. If that course is followed with the leading countries in full accord, another decade may work such a miracle that the historians of the "Literature of Gloom" will have to change their theme or drop their pens and go out of business.

Summer and Boys

AN ANXIOUS mother writes to the editor as follows:

"I have three boys, two of them in High School. They are seventeen, fifteen and twelve years of age. When summer comes I face a problem that I have not been able to solve. It is the problem of a small town. My husband is employed in a shoe store, and there is no work there for any of our boys. We have on our street grocery, dry-goods and drug-stores, barber shops, meat markets, two movies, doctors' and lawyers' offices, one book store, a post-office and three pool halls. But in no one of these places have I been able to find a place for any of my boys to work during the summer. Most of the merchants, as in every small town, employ only just enough clerk help to run the business, and in several cases where they have boys of their own, they put them into their stores in the summer.

"One year my husband and I let the oldest boy go out on a farm, but never again. I have not the time to go over that experience for the boy. We may have been unfortunate in the farmer to whom the boy went, but the hard work and long hours almost broke him down. I don't feel afraid of hard work myself, and I don't think the boys do, either, but the boy came home at the end of the summer with a set purpose never to be a farmer, no matter what else he did.

"So the way things are in our small town, our boys, and our neighbors' boys loaf around a good deal. I can find a little work for mine to do around the house, but we live very simply and there is no yard at our place to keep up, and almost nothing in the way of chores. The last summer our boys got to loafing around the drug-store at nights, and going to the movies nearly every night when they showed, Wednesday and Friday. Boys can't play all the time, and I know that all my boys would be glad to work at something if there was a chance. But what is there for them to do? It seems to me that the community of a small town like ours ought to furnish healthy work of some kind for school boys in the summer. The churches here, there are five, have never done anything to settle this problem, and the city council has never suggested anything. But it is a real problem to scores of families here. I have come to look forward to the summer with real dread. It is a tragedy to live in a small town that has no work for boys in the summer."

This looks like a challenge to the churches in small towns, or at least a problem for town councils to take up. Nothing is quite so demoralizing to a boy as long periods of idleness in summer. The average healthy boy does not need to play for three months. It would be a fine thing for the American school system to have some sort of plan to provide summer schools for boys and girls just as the colleges are doing. But if that is not feasible, let the churches and town councils take up this matter and answer those who, like this mother, are anxious for their boys to do something besides go to the drug-store and the movies when summer comes.

The "Jiner"

"YES," says the Average Citizen, "I belong to the noble army of 'Jiners.' I belong to the Chamber of Commerce, the Rotary Club, the Gideons, the Social Service Club, the Good Citizenship Club, the Law Enforcement League, the Chess Club, the Seaside Golf Club, the Literary Club, the Art Guild, the Library Association, the Red Cross, the Church, the Masons, and several other lodge organizations, the Amateur Photographers' Club, and an institution sometimes called the HOME. Oh, no, not the Old Men's Home, just HOME."

"I go to as many of these institutions and organizations as I can from duty, and because I pay dues to all of them and feel like getting my money's worth. The dues to all the things to which I belong and which I have 'jined,' not counting the organization called the HOME, amount to about $675 a year.

"I have been looking over my little diary for the last two weeks and you may be interested to see how good a 'jiner' I am.

"Sunday, went to Church in the morning and evening. Monday, went to Church Brotherhood supper. Tuesday evening, a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce to discuss how to make a better city. Wednesday, had a meeting of the Law Enforcement League to discuss ways of enforcing the Prohibitory law. Thursday, called a meeting from seven to eight in the evening to elect officers of the Golf Club getting HOME at eleven-thirty. Friday, monthly meeting of the Chess Club. Games were long, session closing at midnight. Saturday night, helped induct new members into the Knights of The Future. Sunday night, called a meeting after the evening service, of the deacons and trustees to confer with our pastor over the all-members drive to come off next week, calling for only two nights out for the committee. Monday, went to meeting of the Library Association to discuss the need of a new building. Tuesday, attended a special meeting of the Art Guild to examine some pictures on exhibit from Podunk. Very enjoyable evening. My wife was with me. Wednesday evening, banquet of the Rotarians, at a neighboring town. Was gone over Thursday night. Friday, read a paper at the Literary Club, which was discussed at length. Reached HOME before midnight. Saturday, election of officers of the Social Service Club. Rather a long session. But I was at HOME before eleven."

"What is this organization you mentioned, called a HOME?" asked the Young Man Around Town.

"Oh, that," says the Average Citizen, "is a place where I eat two meals a day, and sleep when I am not off on a banquet tour somewhere. It is quite a convenient institution to belong to."

"But I notice you never mentioned spending an evening at this place called HOME?"

"Of course not. How can I if I am a 'Jiner'?"

"I don't see how you can."

"Have either of you noticed how fast the divorces are increasing in this country?" asks Old Man Ultimate Consumer.

"No," say the Average Citizen and The Young Man Around Town.

"They are," says Old Man Ultimate. "I wonder why?"

"Yes, queer thing, isn't it?" says the Average Citizen. "I wonder why?"

The Evil Heart of Unbelief

A Sermon by REV. BENJAMIN COX, D.D.*

TEXT—Heb. 4:11. "Lest any man fall after the same example of disobedience." (Unbelief.)

I USED to look upon Canaan as being typical of heaven, but now I have come to believe that it represents rather the "rest that remaineth to the people of God here"—the spiritual blessing that are ours in Christ Jesus. The wilderness experience of the children of Israel was very necessary. The wandering was not necessary. In this wilderness experience we find some fine illustrations.

Here is the Dead Sea, which represents and illustrates in a way our separation from the old life through the blood of Jesus. Some of you are looking back to what you were before your experience at the cross; how you now love the things you once hated, and now hate the things you once loved. Christ was not inviting to you. He was like a "root out of a dry ground." Is there anything more uninviting than a root out of a dry ground? There is nothing specially attractive about a root, even if the ground be fertile; but what is there more uninviting than the root from which the dry ground has been scratched away? But now, such a wonderful change has taken place because of your experience at the cross, that you can say with Paul: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world."

Then their experience at Marah was very helpful. That signifies the taking of hardships and making blessings of them. Exodus 15:23-25, "And when they came to Marah they could not drink of the waters, for they were bitter. Therefore, the name of it was called Marah. And the people murmured against Moses saying, What shall we drink? And he cried unto the Lord and the Lord showed him a tree which when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet. There he made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them." There is only one tree that can sweeten the hard Marah experiences that come to us and that is the Tree of Calvary.

In the third place, they had a very interesting experience at Elim, and that soon after their adventure at Marah. "And they came to Elim where there were twelve wells of water and threescore and ten palm trees, and they encamped there by the waters." This illustrates the rest and refreshment that the Lord gives to us in our wilderness experience.

THEIR experience at Sinai is suggestive also. Here it is they come in touch with God's holiness, and cannot approach the Mountain of Law. It quakes and trembles, and they, too, tremble. We are reminded that "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight, for by the law is the knowledge of sin."

Their wilderness experience was necessary, but their wanderings were not, as I said before. Let us learn from Israel's mistakes, lest we fail to enter the Canaan of rest because of the same thing that kept them out—the evil heart of unbelief. Notice the spies are sent out, and at a very auspicious time—the season of ripe grapes. The bunches of grapes are so big that two men come back carrying one bunch between them. Ten of the twelve spies report that the land indeed flows with milk and honey, but they go on to say: "And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak which come of the giants. And we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight." The trouble with the ten spies lay in the fact that they kept their eyes on the giants and away from God, therefore when they saw themselves they appeared as grasshoppers. If we have our eyes on God, the number and size of the giants will not dismay us, but if we fail to see God and spend our time looking for giants, we ourselves shall appear just as they did, as mere grasshoppers. Caleb and Joshua, with their eyes off the giants and on God said "We are well able to take the land." Then the congregation cried, "Stone them with stones!" and that has been done ever since.

Men in Gospel days, like Caleb and Joshua of old, bring the report that God is able to save the vilest of sinners, that "where sin hath abounded grace did much more abound," and a cold, skeptical world cries out against them. They preach against sin, as a minister of Fort Worth preached plainly against the sin of church members who made a good part of their money by renting out buildings to be used as saloons and dives, and the world cried "Stone him!" There are lots of ways to stone a man with stones, and so they set fire to his church house and charged him with burning it, but he stood firm, and today he is preaching to great audiences. In his Sunday school on a recent Sunday there were 42,000 present. His auditorium was built to seat five thousand, and hundreds are turned away every Sunday night.

OTHER earnest pastors with the courage of Caleb and Joshua preached in the prohibition campaign, claiming that God was able to give the victory, and again the world cried, "Stone them with stones! If you preach against liquor it will hurt our business." They said to Sam Jones: "If you preach against the saloon, grass will grow in our streets." He replied: "Then we will raise more hay and less hell." Still other Calebs and Joshuas proclaim the power of the Lord against the gambling evil, and the world cries, "Stone them with stones! They are tampering with personal liberty." When others claim that the Lord is able to conquer the awful sex impurity of the present days, the world again calls out: "Stone them with stones! They will corrupt our people. Such preaching will suggest things." You do not need any "suggestions" under existing conditions.

So wherever the modern Calebs and Joshuas proclaim that there is to be found in Jesus complete victory over sin, the world says: "Stone them with stones! We are bound to sin. We must sin." But I maintain that if God is able to keep you victorious us pass, I pray thee, through thy country. We will not pass through the fields or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of the wells. We will go by the king's highway, we will not turn to the right hand nor to the left until we have passed thy borders. And Edom said unto the messengers: Thou shalt not pass by me lest I come out against thee with the sword. And the children of Israel said unto him. We will go by the highway. And if I and my cattle drink of thy water, then I will pay for it. I will only, without doing anything else, go through on my feet. And he said, Thou shalt not go through. And Edom came out against him with much people and with a strong hand." (Numbers 20:14-20.) And so, instead of going through Edom, they had to compass the country.

It is a humiliating spectacle to see the chosen people of the earth today who have to humiliate themselves before the world, and all because they were kept out of Canaan by the evil heart of unbelief. Jesus in His earthly ministry found the same trouble. It is said of Him "When He came to His own country, He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief. It is said also that He marveled at their unbelief." And in Mark 16:14, we read these striking words: "Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen Him after He was risen."

SO IT is with Jesus now. He marvels at the unbelief of His own people. It is not the sins of others that trouble Him, but the unbelief of His own people. He upbraids them for their unbelief when they refuse to believe in the power of the resurrected Christ. If He does no mighty works among us in these times, it is for the same reason—unbelief. If He is not using us in the salvation of sinners, it is because we ourselves have this evil heart of unbelief.

Thank God, there is no qualifying adjective before the word "sinners" in that wonderful text which says "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." If we have not victory over sin through Jesus, it is wholly because of this evil heart of unbelief. If we refuse to accept the blessing of the Lord in healing our bodies as well as our souls it is because of the same evil heart of unbelief.

"Oh," you say, "we need good buildings." I agree with you. "We need good Sunday-school equipment." That is correct. "We need good music." That is so. "Oh," you say, "we need more money." That is correct, too; but let us beware of depending on our money. During the Seventy-five Million Campaign I had an interview with a dear friend, one of the leaders of the movement, and I told him that my great fear was that Southern Baptists would be in danger of depending upon the seventy-five millions and forgetting the Lord. I took the position that they were better off with seventy-five dollars, having the Lord in mind, than with seventy-five millions forgetting Him. I believe that one reason the Lord has allowed trouble to come is because of this danger of our depending too much upon money and too little upon Him.

Yes, we do need buildings. We do need equipment. We do need music. We do need advertising. We do need money. But most of all we need FAITH. "According to your faith, be it unto you."

"Oh, for a faith that will not shrink, though pressed by every foe,
That will not tremble on the brink of any earthly woe!
A faith that shines more bright and clear when tempests range without;
That, when in danger, knows no fear, in darkness, feels no doubt.
God give us such a faith as this! and then whate'er may come,
We'll taste, e'en here, the hallowed bliss, of our eternal home."

AT THE third Annual Convention and World Conference on Christian Fundamentals, which meets in Denver June 12 to 19, the leading subjects to be discussed are announced as follows: "The Relation of Evangelical Faith to Evangelism," "The Menace of Modernism," "The Test of Theories as Theological Education," "The Scriptures and Sunday-School Instruction," "The Bible the only Basis of Christian Belief," "Faith and the Future of Christian Education," and "The Fundamentals in Foreign Missionary Work." The list of speakers includes Rev. W. B. Riley of Minneapolis, Minn., Rev. Cortland Myers, Don O. Shelton, Rev. A. C. Dixon, Mr. C. G. Trumbull, Bishop Chas. L. Mead, and possibly Rev. Paul Rader, Dr. James M. Gray, Hugh Monroe, and others.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Come, Thou Almighty King," or "Rock of Ages."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—"The Call to Righteousness," Isaiah 54:6-13.

Dr. Jowell's Sunday Meditation (see page 424, first column).

Sermon—"THE EVIL HEART OF UNBELIEF"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Sweet Hour of Prayer," or "Shining Shore."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Thou who has protected us this day, defend us when night draws nigh, and may Thy Light make of all darkness sunshine, of all fear confidence, and of all despair eternal hope through Jesus Christ Who is the Light of the world. AMEN.

over sin for one minute, He can keep you victorious for ten minutes. If He can keep you for ten minutes, He can keep you for one hour, a day, a week, a month. If He can keep you a month, He can keep you a year, and through all the years to come.

When, like Caleb and Joshua, our Gospel messengers proclaim that in our Canaan inheritance in Jesus there is for us healing for the body as well as blessing for the soul, the scoffing world cries out: "Stone them with stones! It cannot be. The days of miracles are past." But they cannot cite chapter and verse teaching that the days of miracles are past. I thank God that in my congregation is a dear woman who was born deaf and dumb, who did not hear or speak a word until last summer. It was a glorious sight when on a recent Sunday, she brought a deaf and dumb friend with her and interpreted on her hands a part of the sermon.

NOTE the awful results of unbelief. The Israelites went back and spent forty years in wandering from Kadesh-Barnea to Ezion-Geber and return. All through this wandering they had trouble and humiliation. Especially are we impressed with their humiliation when they seek to pass through the country of Edom. They, God's chosen people, the kings and queens of the earth, forced to come crouching and saying to the king of Edom: "Thus saith thy brother Israel, thou knowest all the travail that hath befallen us, how our fathers went down into Egypt, and we have dwelt in Egypt a long time, and the Egyptians vexed us and our fathers. And when we cried unto the Lord, he heard our voice and sent an angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt, and behold, we are in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy borders. Let

The Most Exalted Taste

SUNDAY. I Pet. 2:3. "If ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." Everything begins here. It is no use our dreaming of perfected human relationships until the individual has deliberately tasted the things that are Divine. A chastened palate in the individual is a primary element in the consolidation of the race. There must be a personal experimenting with God. There must be a willingness to try the spiritual hygiene enjoined in the Gospel of Christ. We must 'taste and see' what the grace is like that is so freely offered to us of God. We must taste it, and find out for ourselves its healthy and refreshing flavor.

What is implied in the apostle's figure? In the merely physical realm, when we taste a thing, what are the implications of the act? When we take a thing up critically for the purpose of discerning its flavor, there are at any rate two elements contained in the method of our approach. There is an application of a sense, and there is the exercise of the judgment. We bring an alertness of palate that we may register sensitive perceptions, and we bring an alertness of mind that we may exercise a discriminating judgment.

Well, these two elements are only symbolic of the equipment that is required if we would "taste and see how gracious the Lord is." We need to present to the Lord a sensitive sense and a vigilant mind. There is no word which is read so drowsily as the Word of God. There is no business so sluggishly executed as the business of prayer. If men would discern the secret flavor of the Gospel, they must come to it wide awake, and sensitively search for the conditions by which its hidden wealth may be disclosed. "Son of man, eat that thou findest . . . Then did I eat it, and it was in my mouth as honey for sweetness."

"Eat that thou findest!" Well, the only way in which we can eat a message is to obey it. Obedience is spiritual consumption; and in the act of obedience, in the act of consumption, we discern the wondrous flavors of grace. We are, therefore, to approach the Gospel of our Lord. We are patiently and sensitively to realize its conditions. We are to put ourselves in the attitude of obedience, and, retaining a bright and wakeful mind, we shall begin to discern the glories of our redemption. We shall taste the flavor of reconciliation, the fine grace of forgiveness, and the exquisite quality of peace. This is the primary step in the creation of the family; the individual is to taste and appreciate the things of God.

All delights imply repulsions. All likes necessitate dislikes. A strong taste for God implies a strong distaste for the ungodly. The more refined my taste, the more exacting becomes my standard. The more I appreciate God, the more shall I deprecate the godless. I do not wonder, therefore, that the "tasting" of grace is accompanied by a "putting away" of sin. If I welcome the one, I shall "therefore" repel the other. The finer my taste, the more scrupulous will be my repulsions.

Mark the ascending refinement in this black catalog of expulsions: "wickedness, vile, hypocrisies, envies, evil speakings!" The list ranges from thick, sodden compact wickedness up to unkindly speech, and I am so to grow in my Divine appreciation that I just as strongly repel the gilded forms of sin as I do those that savor of the exposed and noisome sewer. The taste of grace implies the "putting away" of sin, and therefore the second step in the creation of the family is the cleansing of the individual. J. H. J.

Welcoming the Prodigal

MONDAY. Luke 15:21. "I am no more worthy." The prodigal was quite right when he said to his father, "I am not worthy to be called thy son." He had gone away of his own accord, had taken his patrimony with him and squandered it, had forfeited every rational claim to his father's consideration. Nevertheless, on his return, he was welcomed to the old home and restored to all the privileges which he had thus voluntarily and recklessly given up.

The same is true of the penitent sinner who comes home to God. He knows he is not worthy to gather up the crumbs that fall from the table, yet all the rich viands of grace are spread before him.

A sense of ill desert lies at the very heart of penitence; and, by the same token, it is one of the vital evidences of faith. As in heaven all worthiness is ascribed "to Him that sitteth upon the throne," so here the true follower of Christ is frank to confess that he merits none of the blessings lavished upon him.

"Why was I made to hear thy voice
And enter while there's room
While thousands make a wretched choice
And rather starve than come?"

The point so often urged by non-Christians that "there are better people outside of the church than in it" is well taken; since in this fellowship all are confessedly sinners, sinners without merit, only sinners saved by grace.

"'Twas the same love that spread the feast
That sweetly drew us in,
Else had we still refused to taste,
And perished in our sin." D. J. B.

The Glory of Childhood

TUESDAY. Luke 2:52. "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man." When Jesus was born He put childhood on the throne of the world. Childhood has been endowed with regal splendor and royal prerogatives ever since. Nothing is too good for the child. Every child has a right to be born well and is entitled to the best advantages for development. Childhood everywhere of all races and climes, is sacred and beautiful, created in the divine likeness, packed with potentialities, enriched with possibilities, and heir-apparent to all the best things of the future.

Even the most selfish persons pay the highest tribute to those who come after them. Trees are planted, songs of inspiration written, institutions built, laws framed, books produced, pictures painted, systems of education established and reforms given impetus for posterity. Childhood is the fertile field for our investment. A child has intelligence, but not experience. It is the business of the child to learn, to acquire this experience. It is our business to make it possible for the child to gain the best experience available.

A nation rich in material things and poor in spiritual values is a nation on the downward path. Jesus is our model. He increased in wisdom. That was educational development. He increased in stature. That was physical development. He increased in favor with God. That was religious development. He increased in favor with man. That was social development. Such development makes for the four-square life. Anything short of this causes a lack and creates a void in our national life. The hope of the future, the blessing of the great tomorrow, lie in the growing child of the formative and developing period of today. R. B.

The Unseen Hand

WEDNESDAY. Psa. 139:5. "Thou hast laid Thine hand upon me." The laying upon us of God's hand often means selection. The military law under which we labored during the late war was called the law of selective service. For the first time in our military history we tried on a large scale to classify men as to their capacity for specific kinds of service. There were men who made excellent motor drivers who were not qualified for trench work. There were chemists for research work. There was a youth I know who could not possibly have carried a gun or driven a motor truck, but he knew trees, and the Government sent him into the forests of the Northwest looking for timber for air-craft propellers.

Here was the psalmist, a dreamy-souled but open-eyed shepherd boy. God knew the qualities that lay hidden in his breast. He was a natural leader. Reverence was strong in him. So, because he was a man God could use, God laid His hand on him. Where did that hand lead David? From the sheepfold to the throne.

A thousand years go by. A great work is to be done. It is nothing less than the building of a world-wide Church. Christ was laying the foundations, and He was a Master Builder. He needed twelve men. He did not want all of them to be of the same type. So we see a selecting intelligence at work. What a diversity of genius and talent in the apostolic company!

Fifteen hundred years go by. Another great piece of work is to be done. The Church is overlaid with errors and superstitions and must be cleansed. God lays His hand on a miner's son, a child of the people, of peasant blood. Full-blooded, passionate and honest, with the power of eloquent protest and the gift of rugged speech, Martin Luther felt the unseen Hand laid upon him in an act of selection.

Two hundred years go by. Christ lays His hand upon a young Englishman at Oxford. He is small of body, but lithe and active and capable of tremendous industry and terrible earnestness. John Wesley felt the unseen and selecting Hand. It is ever so. God's hand is still active in history. It is the guiding hand along the way of our pilgrimage. It is the strengthening hand in the day of our struggle with what appears to be adverse fate. It is the establishing hand when we would otherwise be moved from our sure foundations. Let us recognize it when it is laid upon us. Let not our patience resent it or our self-will shake it off for it is the hand of a Father who is also our Uttermost Friend. C. C. A.

The Father's House

THURSDAY. John 14:2. "In my Father's house are many mansions." Have you sometimes longed for and wondered about that haven of rest, the Father's house of "many mansions"? Have you, when pressed by the trials, and weary with the conflict, just longed to lay your head upon the breast of Christ, that you might feel the touch of His hand, and hear the gentle tones of His voice telling you to rest? Have you, when all footsore with the journey, tried to imagine what it would have been like to have been with the disciples that evening, when Jesus laid aside His outer garment and washed the feet of those men?

Of course you have! And sometimes when He seemed so far away, you wondered—just wondered if He really knew. Like Job you could say: "O that I knew the place where I might find Him, that I might come even to His seat." Just a glimpse of His face, and a word from lips that could speak comfortably, and all would be well. You would then feel like taking a fresh hold of the trials, in the confidence that you would come of more than a conqueror. The presence of Jesus is not a matter of time or place, but of triumphant faith in His glorious promise, "Lo, I am with you always." He is still in the Father's house, and so are you. You have but to speak and He will respond. He is ready to walk with you and talk with you, and by the joy of His presence He will roll the clouds away. I. D. L.

The Life More Abundant

FRIDAY. I. Cor. 15:36. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Every seed has its own body which must perish in the ground that the germ may live to produce a great harvest. Otherwise the seed abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. Is it not so that the human body goes down into the earth for the emancipation of the spirit, likewise self dies that the angel of life for others may live? We see this beautiful law in nature. Leaves fade and fall that new life may blossom in the spring-time. So old age is but a premonition of everlasting youth.

The Creator's motto must be "Behold I make all things new": a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. Parting with the old means development of the new. Losing the sinful we find the pure life of Christ within us and become complete in Him. It should be that the longer we live, the more spiritual our joys become. Our affections are upon things above, where are a multitude of our fellows, who have left us awhile with only memories of vivid friendships. Is it not blessed to know that the mortal is to put on the immortal, by dying to the sensual and living to the spiritual? The process is conversion to Christ, a radical change crucified with Him, we become dead to sin and alive unto God.

The heart, like a harp, must be attuned to spiritual melodies to understand heavenly music and divine voices. It is the Christian musician who puts his soul into song, giving it spirit and life. He puts youth into age and life into death. When loved ones go away, it is the soul within them we miss, not the physical and perishable; the soul is everything that is valuable and eternal. We may lose all else and still our riches are illimitable. E. W. C.

More Like the Master

SATURDAY. Matt. 10:24-25. "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord." The character and authority of Jesus are absolutely unique. In person and power we can no more be like Him than the tallow dip can be like blazing Arcturus. That is not what Jesus meant. He meant that those who follow Him must be ready to accept the rough usage He received, that the fare He had should not be rejected by them and they are not to expect better treatment at the hands of the world than He received. In sympathy and character we are to be like Him.

It is easy for many under certain conditions to develop class consciousness, to drift into the feeling that we belong by temperament and calling, in a cultured, intellectual, highly moral class, and that there are even several classes within that class. There is a class for the big influential citizen, another for the man of moderate acquirements, and still others for the representative of schools of various reputations. It is easy for the Jameses and the Johns nearest the Master to slip into the habit of class consciousness.

But those who are the most like their Master in sympathy are very humble, and not even proud of their humility. Spiritual honors bring spiritual responsibilities which may eventually weigh down even the strongest. The church that is built of folks like the Master is a vital, compelling force yet without being proud or self-seeking. H. P. H.

Senate Adopts Disarmament Amendment by Unanimous Vote

THE strength of the American sentiment for ending the competition among nations to excel in preparedness for war was strikingly exemplified when the Senate, with seventy-four members present, unanimously adopted the Borah naval disarmament amendment to the Naval Appropriation bill. Under this amendment President Harding "is authorized and requested to invite the Governments of Great Britain and Japan to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the duty of promptly entering into an understanding or agreement by which the naval expenditures and building programs of each . . . shall be substantially reduced annually during the next five years to such an extent and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, which understanding or agreement is to be reported to the respective governments for approval."

A similar amendment was defeated in the House because of the President's belief that the issuance of a call for such a conference should be left entirely to his discretion, but he had withdrawn his opposition before the proposal came to a vote in the Senate. With Mr. Harding ready to accept the amendment, it was predicted by leaders that the House also would adopt the disarmament clause without a dissenting vote when the conference report on the Naval bill comes before it.

There was prolonged debate on the Naval bill in the Senate, where nearly $100,000,000 had been added to the House draft in committee, and efforts to obtain heavy reductions in the Senate total of $500,000,000 were defeated. One of the hardest fights was over the proposal to cut the enlisted personnel from 120,000 to the 100,000 provided in the House measure, but the larger figure was retained by a vote of 45 to 23, thirty-one Republicans and fourteen Democrats voting for it, while thirteen Republicans and ten Democrats opposed it. An attempt to have the United States appoint a representative to the League of Nation's Disarmament Commission was defeated by a vote of 42 to 22.

Harding Seeks to Fund Allied Debts

INFORMATION that the United States is seeking to change the form of the Allied debts to this government so as to permit their distribution among the people, with a consequent reduction of the tax burden, was conveyed by President Harding in one of his New York speeches and has caused widespread discussion because of the magnitude of the financial operations involved.

"The exigencies of war compelled the Government to take, by taxation, much wealth from our people to be loaned to our Allies," Mr. Harding said. "This is the basis of their obligation to us, and it is not a good form in which to hold the obligations of one people to another people. It is altogether to be hoped that in a reasonable period we may change the form of these obligations and distribute them among all the people. We hope that this may be accomplished and also that there may be effective reduction of the cost of government. In these ways we hope to release a great volume of wealth and credit from the burden that government has been imposing and make it available for the development of domestic industry and the expansion of foreign trade."

In authoritative circles in Washington it was explained that no pressure on Europe to pay her debts in the near future was contemplated, but that negotiations are in progress looking toward the re-funding of the debts of the Allied countries from mere promises to pay into long-term obligations. The bonds of the foreign countries would be delivered to Washington and sold to the people of the United States with the guarantee of our government, the proceeds being used to retire Liberty Bonds. This would reduce not only America's bonded indebtedness but also the interest payments. Officials doubted that any of these bonds would be offered for sale within a year.

The proceeds of the five Liberty loans totaled $21,435,370,600 and the American loans to Europe ran up to $9,711,739,636, so that the transfer of the Allied obligations would cancel nearly half of the Liberty Bonds.

Bankers Dine at White House

A GATHERING of prominent bankers at the White House which at times in the last quarter-century would have caused a tremendous outcry against "Wall Street influence" in government affairs initiated a series of conferences which President Harding intends to hold with financial interests regarding the flotation of foreign loans and the revival of American industry and export trade.

In addition to Secretaries Mellon and Hoover the President had at dinner with him: J. P. Morgan, Charles H. Sabin, Paul Warburg, James A. Alexander, C. E. Mitchell and William Kent, all connected with great New York banking houses; Benjamin Strong, governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank; and H. C. McEldowney, a Pittsburg banker.

No advance notice of the conference had been given and it was secret in a sense, but it was made known that nearly every phase of the foreign and domestic situation was discussed. No final decision was reached on any question, and other financial conferences are to follow. One topic was that of limiting foreign loans here, as far as practicable, to the settlement of outstanding obligations or the stimulation of American industries and exports. The bankers were said to be in agreement on that principle, but to be in doubt regarding the extent to which it could be carried out without an unfortunate reaction. They prom-

The bankers were unanimous in saying that the best way to help the nation's export trade and thus stimulate industry is to aid in bringing about better financial conditions in Europe, but it was agreed that any process of readjustment must necessarily be slow.

Silesian Situation Clearing

THE Wirth ministry in Germany has taken up its work with a display of strength and energy which has surprised the many observers who predicted its speedy fall, and the evidences of good faith toward the Allies which it has given have brought words of commendation from Premier Briand in the French Chamber of Deputies. Particularly in regard to the Silesian controversy has the attitude of the Wirth ministry won approval.

News that battalions of German troops had crossed over into Silesia prepared to give battle to the Polish forces which had invaded that province in defiance of the Allies caused Premier Briand to send a note to Berlin demanding that Germany take steps immediately to prevent the further passage of German troops into Silesia, and to obtain the withdrawal of those already across the border, with the warning that a German invasion of Silesia would be regarded by France as a casus belli. The German Government replied at once that it would close the frontier to prevent the passage of troops and would disband the volunteer bands formed in eastern Germany in the last three weeks. Advices from Allied sources showed that Germany was enforcing vigorous measures for keeping the peace and for punishing those who sought to recruit forces for attacking the Polish invaders.

Premier Briand, in a long address before the French Deputies, made a plea for moderation toward Germany, which revealed a new attitude. He declared Dr. Wirth had manifested "great frankness and great loyalty," had undertaken engagements and taken steps to carry them out, and that France owed it to herself and to the world to give Berlin a chance to make good its new promises. "While I am upon the bridge I shall not drive the ship upon the rocks," he said in announcing that the Chamber must get a new chief if it refused to back up his policy of moderation, for which he claimed the support of the public opinion of the republic. The Premier won the vote of confidence which he demanded from the Chamber by a vote of 403 to 163.

Both the French and British Premiers have adopted a more conciliatory attitude regarding the Silesian muddle, although the British and Italians still advocate a boundary line different from that favored by the French. One suggestion for a settlement attributed to the British was that Germany should receive the undoubtedly German portions of Silesia, Poland the Polish sections, and that the disputed industrial section should be administered for thirty years by an international commission. Premier Briand scoffed at the idea that the Allied differences over Silesia could break up the entente.

Dublin Custom House Burned

THE burning of the Dublin Custom House by Sinn Feiners in an afternoon attack in which eighteen persons were killed overshadowed all other events of a stormy and riotous election week in Ireland. The building, which was 120 years old and one of the most imposing in Ireland, housed many important government departments, and its destruction was the most important damage of the rebellion. It occupied an entire block, and the property loss was estimated at $5,000,000, to say nothing of the loss of archives which cannot be replaced. The burning of the structure was said to be more disabling to the governmental machinery than that of Dublin Castle itself would have been.

The attack was carried out with machine-like precision. Police sentries on guard at the entrances were overpowered in a moment by assailants who sprang upon them from the passing crowds, and the attacking forces hurried into the offices, held up the officials at revolver point, then saturated books and documents with petrol and set fire to them. In a few moments the greater part of the huge structure was in flames. Reinforcements of Crown forces arrived before the Sinn Feiners had time to depart and there was sharp fighting for a few minutes. Then the Sinn Feiners were driven to flight, leaving about fifty of their number as prisoners.

A NEW STANDARD OF EFFICIENCY IN THE USE OF MATERIALS

WHEREVER business men gather together today you hear of economies in production—new standards of efficiency for labor, for machinery and in the distribution of finished products.

Reconstruction demands lower production costs and higher relative values.

It demands a new standard of efficiency in the use of materials; and especially true is this in the use of lumber.

It may surprise you to know that the service value of the average purchase of lumber could be increased 100%, if the buyer chose the most practical wood and the most economical grade for a given purpose.

Lumber is more intimately woven into our complex industrial fabric than perhaps any other basic material. In the production of coal, in the manufacture of machinery, in the distribution of countless commodities where we least expect it, lumber touches every home, every farm, every business in the land.

That is why an enlightened lumber service is important in this period of industrial reconstruction and in the great era of home-building that is ahead.

Lumber is capable of the same close analysis as is a bar of steel or a block of concrete.

For years there has been accumulating a mass of close-knit knowledge about the kinds of wood, their service values and adaptabilities.

Few men are aware how well-rounded and scientific this knowledge of lumber is.

The strength of the various species. Their durability. Their service qualities.

What kind of lumber is best adapted to the manifold industrial uses. Which will give the longest service under exposure to the weather. What kinds are most suitable for construction purposes, and what for interior trim.

Add to this the advanced knowledge of wood preservation—and you begin to see the far-reaching benefits of this lumber service.

What we advocate is conservation and economy through the use of the right wood in its proper place.

To this end we will supply to lumber dealers and to the public, any desired information as to the qualities of the different species and the best wood for a given purpose.

This service will be as broad and impartial as we know how to make it. We are not partisans of any particular species of wood. We advise the best lumber for the purpose, whether we handle it or not.

From now on the Weyerhaeuser Forest Products trade-mark will be plainly stamped on our product.

When you buy lumber for any purpose, no matter how much or how little, you can look at the mark and know that you are getting a standard article of known merit.

Weyerhaeuser Forest Products are distributed through the established trade channels by the Weyerhaeuser Sales Company, Spokane, Washington, with branch offices and representatives throughout the country.

Do You Borrow the Christian Herald?

THIS question is addressed to those members of the Christian Herald family, who are not subscribers, but to whom subscribers gladly lend their copy of the Christian Herald.

The Christian Herald is a great spiritual force.

Its strength grows as its readers increase.

The person who loans you his paper multiplies its influence by two. He gets as much pleasure out of giving as you do in receiving.

Now—why not multiply this force by four?

Send $2.00 to-day for a year's subscription. You, yourself will have a paper each week to loan to some one. Your friend also will be able to loan his copy elsewhere. Instead of two homes in your town being blessed with the spiritual influence of the paper, four will be energized and stimulated. The paper will thus have four opportunities to help the young people of those families to get started right.

We know from past experience that a great many readers of courtesy mean to be readers by right of purchase. Each year many of these subscribe. Why not do so now—and do your part in helping us to publish the Christian Herald and extend its influence for good.

Effective Church Advertising

PERHAPS the best answer to the question "Can We Advertise Christianity?" is that Christianity is being advertised in paid newspaper space in many cities of the country, some of which "ads" are of considerable size. The Federation of Churches of Portsmouth, Ohio, for example, for the three weeks preceding Easter, this year, spent $440 in daily copy in both newspapers in the town, setting forth various phases of the claims of Christianity. These "ads" were signed by the twenty-five churches of seven denominations, which are members of the Federation, but money was solicited from business firms of the city.

The effort first was to raise $500. The contributions came in so rapidly, however, that $720 was on hand before the pastors cried "Enough." The money not spent at Easter-time is being used to run small copy every Saturday throughout the year. The "ads" preceding Easter were twelve inches on four columns, or larger. One advertisement, paid for jointly by the banks of the town, and signed by them, occupied fifteen inches on five columns. In this advertisement the bankers say:

"We know that the unseen forces of life—honesty, integrity, fair dealing—are stronger than steel doors, time-locks and brawny special officers.

"Honesty, sense of right, conscience, religion—call it what you will—we bankers know it exists. The strong boxes are for the few subnormal men who prove the general rule of honesty.

"Every banker in Portsmouth knows that if churches had not been here since the beginning of the town, the banks could not stay a week—would never have been. Law and order must precede safe banking. Churches induce law and order.

"We support the churches, each banker and employee, according to his choice, because we want Portsmouth to grow and become a better place in which to live and raise a family. We know that along the path of righteousness and this alone, lies stable, continuous prosperity. We want to put our influence on the side of right every time.

"The bankers of this city know that the church is the sole institution which has for its chief business the inculcation of the principles of honesty and right dealing.

"Churches develop faith, and faith is needed before a man is willing to risk his savings and his labor in a project he hopes will mean much to the city and its workers.

"Churches are the ally of everything that is good and the enemy of everything that is wrong. The banks of Portsmouth stand solidly beside the churches on this platform.

"The banks and bankers of Portsmouth cordially invite the officers and employees, and every citizen of this progressive city, to attend some church tomorrow. It is the Sunday before Easter, Palm Sunday. Why not accept this first invitation by the banks of this city to attend church? Pick your church—any church—but go. Be there on time. Go expecting to get some good from it. Go every Sunday. You will never regret it."

ANOTHER "ad," used on Good Friday, signed by the Federation, was illustrated with a cut of the Cross, with the inscription of three languages, which Pilate said should remain on the Cross on which Christ was crucified:

After Lent Is Over

"Shall we be satisfied with the formalities of religion?

"The Christianity which does not carry over into the store, the shop and the office is not very worth-while. Unless we have as much zeal to live close to our ideal on Thursday night as we have on Sunday noon, we have not caught the true spirit of Christianity. "Lent is sometimes twisted into a sort of spiritual comfort by those who devoutly attend special services leading up to Easter, and then with a self-satisfied smile imagine that their duty to their better nature is done for another year.

"Churches are maintained and character is built by regular church attendance and attention to all details of spiritual helpfulness.

"Attendance on special meetings at one season of the year is not enough. The test comes on the Sunday after Easter. Will you be in your place in church then? Will the new-made vows be strengthened with fresh purpose? This is no imputation on the resolve of you who have decided to live "the Jesus way." It is a question which you will have to face when your first temptation arises.

"Determine to live up to your highest ideals now and always.

"PORTSMOUTH FEDERATION OF CHURCHES."

THIS "ad" is typical of the series.

An effort was made in every announcement to give the reader something which would help him be a better man, whether or not he accepted the recurring invitation to attend church.

The headings of other "ads" indicate the nature of the material—"Moral Forces Alone Are Permanent," "Christianity Is Difficult," "Support Your Preacher," "Your Spiritual Income Blank," "Easter Means New Life and Hope," and "Christianity Is the Great Adventure." Copy for these "ads" was furnished at the request of the publicity committee of the Portsmouth Church Federation by the church advertising section of the Department of Publicity of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.

This department sends our weekly copy of a similar nature to 1,800 Presbyterian ministers, who have requested this service. A number of pastors of other denominations have also asked that they be permitted to have these copy suggestions. All of these have attempted to set forth in popular form Christian ideals. One advertisement recently issued was illustrated by a picture of an automobile on a rough road, approaching a hand, directing the wayfarer along the smooth pathway "3 miles to church." The text read:

"Church helps a man from his moral ruts and starts him on the highway of right thinking and right living. The longer we travel in ruts the deeper they become and the more difficult it is to get out of them.

"The churches of this community are here to help you out of both social and moral ruts. They provide Christian fellowship and offer the only solution for sin—the Gospel of Jesus Christ. No man ever regretted the time he spent in church attendance.

"Let us help you out of your ruts—perhaps you will help us out of ours. Come to church Sunday."

Two hundred and thirty-five country newspapers in various parts of the country in the past year have used a series of twelve "ads," issued by newspaper syndicate. The headings of some of these "ads" indicate their evangelical character: "Your Moral Wages," "Can you Keep Sweet at Home?" "Are Your Children in Sunday School?" and "Strengthen Your Moral Convictions."

In some places these "ads" are used by an individual congregation, paid for by the pastor from his tithe account, or by the trustees from their current expense account. In some towns a number of churches unite to buy space in the local paper to use these advertisements of Christianity.

PRAGUE, the capital of the new state of Czechoslovakia, now has a population of almost a million since there have been consolidated with it thirty-eight towns and villages which had grown up around its borders.

Making the Social Order Christian

Luke 4:16-21; Matt. 25:34-40

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THESE two selections from the gospels are taken respectively from the early and concluding parts of the ministry of Jesus Christ. Thus they bring the whole public service to our attention. He presented to the world a program for all life in all time rather than suggestions for some on Sabbath Days. Jesus read that day in the Nazareth synagogue from the Prophet Isaiah, and the fellow townsmen, who observed the life of this new prophet, knew that He exemplified the declaration made in the long ago.

The Church founded by Jesus Christ is essential in making the social order Christian. There are free thinkers today as in other ages, boasting of their independence, who refuse to be related to, or to work in direct co-operation with the Church. They find fault with the Church. Jesus, in talking about the Kingdom of God, told of the wheat and the tares that would grow together until the harvest. It is most valuable to note the attitude of the Founder of the Church toward the synagogue of His place of residence. He "entered, as his custom was, into the synagogue on the sabbath day." Today one of the most important habits in character-building and world-betterment is to be regularly in the Lord's house on the Lord's Day.

Another tremendously valuable statement to be pressed home by every teacher and contemplated by every reader is that Jesus, when the roll of the prophets was handed to Him, was able to find the place. Countless members of the church and Sunday School cannot even find the Lord's Prayer, not to mention other best known portions of the Bible. Test yourself in finding such parables as the Good Samaritan, the Ten Virgins, the Prodigal Son or "Suffer little children to come unto me." When you commit a verse of scripture to memory, memorize also the location by book, chapter and verse, and state it in that order, rather than backwards—the way some preachers announce their texts, as, "the sixteenth verse of the third chapter of John."

"Help" is a world-cry which is coming from every country on both hemispheres. This cry becomes louder just in proportion as we give attention to individuals and communities and note how they live. Is there any balm in Gilead to help the world's festering sores? The non-Christian peoples have no answer from their ages of experience. Baron Sakatani, of Tokyo, declared at the World's Sunday School Convention last fall that Christianity is the one international religion. There must be not only good morals and sound ethics but also a power to enable the individual to live them. Christianity presents the standards and the dynamic for their attainment. Christianity is able to respond to every cry of "Help." Christ's program is a sufficient curriculum in the great School of Life.

IT IS the business of the Church, which has received as a legacy the Great Commission of our Lord, to make living for every person on this globe just as easy as possible. The Church believes the Beatitudes and is under obligation to make every effort to work these into the very life of humanity. The Bible is a book for constant use in daily life. Study and meditation mean little until commands are wrought into deeds. The Bible is the greatest book on sociology that the world has. Man's relations to man and to mankind are perfectly stated therein. There can be no wrongs in society when each person is ready to put the answer into action when the question is asked, "What would Jesus do if He were in my place?"

That the social order is becoming Christian is seen when history is studied. Two flaming illustrations are the abolition of slavery and of the legalized liquor traffic. Child labor is lessening and women's inherent rights are being recognized. Prison reforms, literacy, sanitation, etc., are receiving the attention of all who would make the world or any part of it more livable. Though some will not respond, every person must be given the very best opportunity and environment for self-development.

When a nation teaches the Christian social relationship by example, the whole world can learn. At one time a Japanese gun was fired at an American vessel lying in the Straits of Shimonoseki. In connection with the apology Japan paid to the United States $800,000 in gold as an indemnity. This money was stored in Washington. There were those then in this country who were eager to do their part in making the social order Christian and in time the cases of money were returned to Japan. And this was done without the seals on the several boxes having been broken. Just as it came and even uncounted it was returned. Such neighborliness made a profound impression on the Japanese. They could not spend such money carelessly. The indemnity thus returned was finally used in making the great breakwater in Yokohama harbor so that the vessels of the United States, as well as those of other nations, might ride in safety though even a typhoon raged there. That lesson has not been forgotten.

In more recent years a sum of money was given to the United States by reason of wrongs incident to the Boxer uprising in China. That money, however, is being expended in China and a great university has been established near Peking where Chinese students are trained in respect to things that are good as well as in the great facts of many sciences. John R. Mott has said "What you would have appear in the life of a nation, you must first put in the class room."

LEST the importance of the individual be lost sight of in this tremendously big lesson subject, we must remember the old fact that the whole is but the sum of all its parts. The social order is best made Christian by making Christians. But even though we have in mind such a glorious work as the mass movement in India and elsewhere, where multitudes seek the ordinances of the church more rapidly than they can be carefully instructed in the teachings of the Bible, yet no one becomes a Christian except by obtaining individually, through the work of the Holy Spirit, the new birth, even as Jesus taught Nicodemus at that night school many years ago. Teach this lesson with the supreme object of winning souls to Jesus Christ. You will thus start another life to make the Kingdom come, that His will shall be done in earth even as it is in heaven.

The work of making the social order Christian is staggering in its greatness. It is impossible of accomplishment except in working under the directions of Him who declared that all things are possible to those who have faith. Economy of time and strength are a great consideration. How can this work be done with the least expenditure of the resources that must be involved? The answer is simple. Would that mankind would rise to the challenge! Save the children. John Nuveen, a Chicago banker, said: "The future of our country depends upon the development of a Christian character in what are the boys and girls of today." Woodrow Wilson declared: "The Sunday-school lesson of today is the code of morals of tomorrow. Too much attention cannot be paid the work which it is doing."

Those who would help society cannot do it more effectively or more speedily than by relating themselves to the Sunday School and working therein with all the God-given and God-developed power they can receive. Jesus watches as you work and continues to say, as in the golden text, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me."

summarizes these reasons as follows: "The alleviation of suffering as in the case of famine; self-help or the necessity of student support; the vocational reason, providing a method of obtaining a living suitable to the new intellectual and spiritual life of the convert; and the cultural reason, the development of character." To these most students of this type of work would add "the development of a self-supporting Christian church."

These reasons are worthy, but they are far from being sufficiently comprehensive. A survey of reports and magazine articles dealing with industrial missions discloses scarcely a reference to that more fundamental reason with which we are here dealing—the need of developing the natural resources of missionary countries in the interest of native peoples. The Report of the Panama Congress is a notable exception, the point of view of which is both indicated and summarized in the statement, "It may even fall to the missionary to face the whole problem of improving the economic condition of the community beginning with the Christian elements of it and so lead in the solution of the problem."

THERE does not exist a complete list of industrial missions. In the nature of the case such would be almost impossible of collection. The term as we have seen is not definite; the idea has not permeated the church, so that in some cases Societies maintaining somewhat notable examples of industrial work make little or no mention of them in their reports; missionaries devoting enthusiastic effort to this type of work may be too busy to report it at all or even to answer questionnaires on the subject; industrial departments are sometimes short-lived owing to the vicissitudes of mission finance.

The World Statistics of Christian Missions (1916) lists two hundred and nine industrial schools, but much of the work is attached to some station and would not come under the head of industrial schools. It can hardly be claimed as yet that there is a missionary policy in regard to industrial work.

A policy is developing, however, at least where backward peoples are concerned, through the pressure of missionaries upon the Boards. The Kodaikanal Conferences in India composed of missionaries engaged in industrial work and dealing with this subject show that it had by 1910 assumed great practical importance in that country. The Panama Congress emphasized the importance of industrial and agricultural missions for Latin America and there is general agreement of government commissions, educationalists and students of the native question in South Africa as to the need of such training there.

Perhaps the strongest indication of an increasing emphasis upon this type of work is to be found in the recommendations for Latin America by a Committee on Co-operation acting as a board of strategy for thirty missionary societies which include agricultural and industrial training; and in several more or less tentative programs developing out of The Centenary Movement which call for attention to such subjects in the Training Institutes recommended for Africa, South America and the mass movement area in India.

IT IS important to note that missionaries developing this type of work are definitely seeking in some instances to co-operate with the Government of the country concerned and in notable cases are receiving government aid. The British Government in South Africa has for many years given grants-in-aid to missions offering industrial training. Brazil has asked missionaries to take charge of two of its large industrial schools and the State of Rio Grande do Norte has given to the Presbyterian Mission 10,000 acres of land valued at $200,000 for a modern agricultural school. The president of Paraguay recently begged an American mission representative for an industrial school, a place where the women of his country could learn to cook and sew, and where the men could become good masons and carpenters. Paraguay offered to turn over its agricultural school to missionaries. Bolivia has heavily subsidized missionary education.

Where government plans look toward a national system of education including industrial training, as is true in China and perhaps in India, it is important that missionary policy should take these into careful consideration and work out plans of co-operation. It is evident that in the face of the vast need of these countries missionary industrial schools may continue to play an important part. In China the Government is handicapped by lack of funds and of qualified leaders to carry out its own ideals of education, while Protestant Missions after several decades of experiment are definitely aiming to furnish a thoroughly standardized and co-ordinated system of Christian education.

Where the Government is alien, as in the case of India, the temptation will perhaps prove irresistible to think of technical training in terms of business profit rather than of human welfare. The Christian church has therefore the greater responsibility.

Young People's Topic for June 19

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

C. E., B. Y. P. U., and E. L. Psalms 74: 12-17

THE psalmist in praising God declares "Thou hast prepared the light and the sun." Sun and light are indispensable to life. Darkness makes for decay and death. Sun, light, life, are the characteristics of a normal scheme of things. Darkness, decay, death are the abnormal items in a normal scheme of things. All nature, animate and inanimate, depends on the light of the sun for subsistence. The ancients knew this and even went so far in their appreciation as to worship the sun rather than the Creator of the sun. The power of God is manifested in the sun and the beneficent light it sheds upon the world.

In the spiritual realm light is as potent as in the material universe. Jesus said, "I am the Light of the World." The Christ throws daylight upon the soul. Tennyson said, "What the sun is to the rose, Jesus Christ is to my soul." The genial warmth and glow of His personality ripens character into fair fruitage and causes aspiration and ambition to blossom out into lovely forms of service and ministry. We need light on spiritual problems and amid the gropings of the world for the true path of pilgrimage Jesus Christ gives illumination and guidance. "Thy word is like a lamp unto my feet." Only sin and misery flourish in the dark. Nothing good or true or noble thrives in gloom. Wherever the Gospel is preached there is health of thought, constructive endeavor and noble living. As the material world can not exist without the sun, man cannot exist without the "Light of Life." When our earthly lamp is extinguished then the Sun of Righteousness arises with healing in His wings.

The Sun that glads mine eyes,
Is Christ the Lord I love:
I sing for joy of that which lies
Stored up for us above.

Happy indeed the individual who can sing "Sun of my Soul, Thou Saviour Dear" and who has learned that "The Light of the World is Jesus." The perfect days of universal peace and good will shall come if the Light of the World is shed abroad and focused upon the life of man everywhere

Questions and Answers

READER, Decatur, writes: "We have now been taking the Christian Herald in our home for a little over two years and find it increasingly attractive to our household group. How many years has it been published? We would be glad of a short outline of its past activities."

The Christian Herald's first issue was on Oct. 24, 1878. Its offices were then, as now, in the Bible House, Astor Place, N. Y. It has been interdenominational from the beginning, and is the only journal of large circulation and influence that is welcomed by all denominations alike. Thirty years ago it began on a broad scale to be a channel of national and international benevolence. It was a pioneer in child support and training in missionary lands. It has supported and educated 5,500 orphans in India, 2,000 in China, 800 to 900 in Japan, and numbers in Africa and other lands. It has conducted at various times extensive relief work in India, China, Finland, Italy, Japan and Russia. During the Great War it had relief committees, appointed under the auspices of United States Ambassadors or Consuls-General, in France, Belgium, Germany, Poland, Austria, Serbia, and Turkey, with similar committees for aiding needy war refugees (non combatants) in Holland and England. In times of suffering at home, it has conducted extensive relief work in many domestic fields. It has helped to found both home and foreign missions and to establish workers in new missionary lands, and has given substantial aid to evangelistic work at home. Its Prayer League, founded 10 years ago, now has a membership well approaching 20,000, taking in all the States. Its Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, N. Y., founded in 1894, has received some 60,000 children of poor families up to date, and the Bowery Mission in New York has been conducted under its auspices for the last twenty-six years and is still doing remarkable service.

M. H. W., Devon, Mont., writes: "It is a known fact that while we are here on earth, we must pass through many trials and tribulations. God brings trials and tribulations (more to some than others) upon His children that they may learn more fully not to be selfish, but to have more love and compassion for the welfare of others—to love each other, not in word only, but in deed, and truth. God has set us in this world not to live for ourselves alone but for and with one another to His honor and glory. Christ performs many miracles, but many of the Christians of today say that although He performed many miracles when He was here on earth in flesh, the days of miracles are past! This is not so. We should be able to see this clearly. Sinners are saved today and the sick are made well again by the almighty, merciful, and loving God. He is good to all, but especially so to those who believe and call upon His Holy Name. He does things oftentimes in mysterious ways that we may not like, in order that we may be drawn in closer confidence toward Him and also that those who yet live in their wickedness should repent (Acts 8:22) and turn away from wickedness and idolatry, and instead, call upon and give praise, honor, and glory to the Lord of all, thus becoming Christian examples."

D. H. S., Starksboro, Vt., writes, apropos of the Christian Herald's discussion of the question: "Can We Advertise Christianity?" "Certainly, but the only way is to be ourselves living epistles, known and read of all men. What a farce is being made of religion in these last days! How people are trying to climb up some other way. People heaping to themselves, teachers having itching ears and turning away from the truth, ministers trying to deceive God along with the people, Jannes' and Jambres' work re-enacted. Oh, the long suffering of God! Dear people of God, what does Jesus say? 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me'. Try this. It is all the advertisement needed. New methods are being tried because people do not want to surrender entirely. A genuine turning to God is the only help for this old sin-cursed world with its terrible waves of crime, unrest, misery, and every evil and sin. Let the Church first put on sackcloth and ashes, confess her sin and forsake sham, cant and hypocrisy. 'Then shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings.'"

Mrs. E. W. B., Westerly, R. I., writes: "I was surprised to find in the Mail Bag an intimation that some one had objected to the Christian Herald's Sunday Service at Home. I have been a regular subscriber of the magazine for many years. The first time I read the Sunday Home Service on the farm, it pleased me so very much that I felt that the Christian Herald should never be without it again, as I believed it would prove a blessing to many. For instance: during such storms as we are now having, many families could not leave their homes. They were fortunate to have the Christian Herald. And what a help they must have found it, in enabling them to conduct a little service among themselves! I do not think it will ever be regarded as an excuse for people staying at home Sunday evenings, if they are anyway interested in attending church. I would rather think it might be the means of making some who had been careless in church attendance, more willing to go." The Herald's Home Service she regards as a great help to any families who want to conduct cottage meetings, and who wish the neighbors to attend and share the benefit of united worship.

Mrs. J. A. T., Canby, Minn. See Rev. 21:1-4; also Luke 10:9, Luke 17:21, Luke 11:2 and similar passages. The general interpretation is that the Kingdom begins here, in the hearts of men.

A. J. P., Mohler, Wash. 1. The name "Jew" is derived from the patriarch, Judah, and was first applied to those belonging to the tribe or country of Judah, and afterwards to the subjects of the kingdom of Judah. 2. the gift of tongues at Pentecost was equally miraculous whether the power to speak in the languages of the strangers was conferred upon the disciples, or that the meaning and full import of their message was made clear to their hearers, irrespective of the tongue or dialect in which it was spoken. God is not the author of confusion. The miracle consisted in making the apostolic message intelligible to all. Acts 2:4 makes it clear that "they each began to speak with other tongues," as the Spirit gave them utterance.

H. A. R., Dayton, O. Faith without works is dead, the Scripture tells us. Faith in God and in His free grace through Jesus Christ—that is the first essential. Having repented and accepted, we are impelled to do all that lies in our power wherever opportunity offers. Thus good works are the outcome of faith. An inactive, indifferent Christian is unthinkable. We are spurred onward to good works by the faith and gratitude in our own hearts. Yet we know that all we can do or give could not avail alone. It is the faith that leads us to accept of Christ and His merits and sacrifice that saves.

Mrs. R. A. A., Woodbury, N. J. God's mercy is boundless. He pardoneth whom He will and whom He will he chasteneth. In all ages He has had his witnesses among the nations, men of virtue and uprightness who, knowing not the Gospel, lived by faith. Even in the darkest periods of Jewish history there were doubtless some who were of this class. If the masses were unenlightened, it is still conceivable that God in His mercy might not utterly condemn. In the midst of the blackest of world tragedies, Jesus Himself urged pity on His enemies, praying: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." We can not set limitations to the sovereign mercy of God, nor have any of us the right to assume to judge others. Divine wisdom alone is equal to such a task. There are today many earnest Christians among the Jews, probably more than we imagine. Let us hope that they may be brought in greater numbers to see the light and to come out of the darkness of unbelief. That they will yet be converted the Word plainly declares (see Romans 11:1-12; Isa. 2:2-4; Jer. 3:18; 16:14, 5, and other passages).

F. N. W., Princeton, N. J. The Dr. Young referred to in the Christian Herald of February 19th was, of course, the famous English poet, author of "Night Thoughts," and not the late Dr. Young, of Princeton.

Prohibition Law in India

EVERYWHERE I have gone throughout Europe and Asia, on the boats, on the trains, as men have spotted me for an American, has come the question, "How do you like prohibition in America?" Somehow my heart thrills with a new sense of pride in my country as I think of what prohibition means to America.

While I was in Jerusalem I heard the American consuls had been ordered to turn down their glasses at all public functions, in keeping with the prohibition law, although they are outside the bounds of the United States. I have seen no official announcement to this effect, but I hope it is true.

There is no prohibition law on the statute books of India, but there is a law written in the heart of India's people. For hundreds of years the powers of Hinduism have discountenanced drunkenness in this land. Mohammedanism and Buddhism have prohibited intoxicants altogether. Other forces have been allied with them in building up—not exactly a public opinion—but a public virtue antagonistic to liquor. I substitute another word for "public opinion" because opinion is not public in India. The great caste system still prevails, and it is rather opinion within a caste than any united opinion.

It is hard for Americans and Europeans to estimate the power of public opinion until we get into a land like India, where opinion is so cut up. What I mean is: Buddhism might stand against liquor, but with all of its power it would have no influence in making the Mohammedans stand. Mohammedans stand against liquor, but not in connection with the Buddhists. Three outstanding religious forces have each spoken on the liquor question, and, with other factors, bring the overwhelming majority of human beings in India under this prohibition law of the heart, or, rather, of religion. There is a strong feeling against liquor in all the upper classes of India's people.

THE Europeans who have come in are breaking down this religious statute. They have openly done their carousing, and, while it was a great shock to the natives at first, little by little these men, who all their lives long have considered drink a very great evil, have broken over the law of their conscience and have become partakers with the Europeans. Europe, thank God, has not yet brought these countries to a place of drunkenness, for one can spend years in India and not see a drunken native. The drinking among the natives is not public, and it is only under strictest privacy that some of the high-caste men will drink.

If India should want a prohibition law I do not know how she would get it if it depended even upon these natives who do not themselves drink. India has no system or institution which is common to all, through which ideas or ideals may be communicated. One wonders how these religions survive, for there seems to be no system for their propagation. The Buddhists and the Jains have monks who do a little educational work of a very rude sort. They also preach occasionally. However, they are much too busy in the task of saving their own souls to look out for the souls of others or to care to lead in any reform. There have been Samajes who have led in some religious reformations in India, but if one depended upon the officials of these religions uniting in a moral movement, one would wait a long time. The Mohammedans have no clergy. Their reader is what we would call a janitor. The leading Mohammedan official of the mosque sweeps out, calls out, and reads out at stated intervals, but does not trouble to do anything outside the mosque.

The prohibition of liquor in the Mohammedan world has come entirely from the teaching of the Koran. There is nothing in the religions of India to teach them to go out of their way to help others. Paul Dahlke, an enthusiastic and sympathetic apologist for Buddhism, has said: "That cordiality which forgets itself for others; that

Christianity Must Win the Land if It Is to Be Saved from the Liquor Scourge

affection which breeds tenderness and emotion, is entirely wanting in Buddhism. The whole moral scheme of it is nothing but a sum in arithmetic set down by a cold, clean egoism: 'As much as I give to others, so much will come again to me.'"

This, you will notice, is extreme individualism. Social and co-operative work does not thrive in an atmosphere like this. When you know the Buddhist monk and his philosophy you will not go into the monastery to find a hero. It has been said of Buddhism, "Each man's great task is to develop his own character, to pile up merit for himself, to cut all ties—social, as well as sinful—and to get out of this evil and sorrowful world into Nirvana (which means nothingness) as soon as possible."

The Parsee priests are less respected than other monks or priests, and are very often the most ignorant in the community. The Sikh priests read once or twice a day from their sacred book, in a tongue that is so sacred that it cannot be understood by the people, and very often not even by the priests themselves. It is said that the Sikh priest spends most of his time plying a brush made of peacock feathers and seeking "baksheesh." So these will not aid in any reform in India.

The Hindu Gurus or teachers are propagandists of superstition. Of the Brahmin priests, one of the best authorities, starting with a dash, says, "Of them it were perhaps best to say nothing at all. They are, as a rule, lazy, ignorant, avaricious. Their official occupation is pouring water on a "Lingam," repeating verses, many of which they do not understand, putting mystic marks in the foreheads of the faithful (for a consideration), and squeezing money from the pious pilgrim, and the rest of the truth about them is hardly fit to print."

WHERE, in this array, will we find the men who will lead in any kind of temperance reform? Yet, if India is ever to be saved from the ravages of liquor, it must be done at once, for a new day is on. The war has greatly shaken the caste system, as it has shaken many other strong things in the world and been the undoing of many governments. We are praying that in India we may be shaken with a mighty revival, for unless she is shaken by a revival there is no hope of reformation.

I have been through Scotland, England, Palestine, and now through India, and I say very earnestly, that unless all of these places are touched with a mighty God-sent revival there is no hope for any reformation. Reformation is not a pioneer; reformation is never a Christian program. Evangelization, salvation, is God's program through Jesus Christ, and then follows the product called "reformation."

Only God knows how marvelously the evangelists who swept over America, leaving behind them a trail of converts, produced soil in which this great temperance reformation grew. The Women's Christian Temperance Union, that organization which became the great educating factor concerning the effects of alcohol, through school and press and public platform, was a product of revival and came from the efforts of Christian women who had turned from self to others.

It is preaching Christ and a revival which India needs first. The first thought of men and women who have been saved is of others. The heart flows out to a perishing world. One of our splendid American psychologists and philosophers has said of Christianity: "The greatest argument for the superiority of Christianity is the fact that it is supremely the missionary religion. One might even go so far as to say that a religion deserves to succeed just in so far as it has the missionary spirit, for the missionary spirit is the spirit of loving service. It is the incarnation of Christianity. Hence, it is astounding to find Christians, as one so often does, who do not believe in missions. Wherever Christianity ceases to be a missionary religion it ceases to be Christian." Only Christianity turns the hearts of men toward their fellows.

The absence of drinking in India has not come because the Indians love their fellow-men, but because, in all of these early religions there was an inward working in the practise of Yoga and meditation, with which liquor interfered. Men could not practise what was really self-hypnosis through these Yoga customs, which were fundamental in their religions, and drink liquor; hence, the founders of these religions were strong in their protest against the use of intoxicants. I am sure that the history of these religions and a study of their philosophy, will bear me out in the statement that they are not primarily altruistic.

THE hope of reformation in India, as I have said, and in the rest of the world, is through Christianity first. India is the man going down to Jericho. She has fallen among thieves, and the priests and the Levites—which represent the law and religions of India pass by on the other side. Dr. Copleston, after years of experience in India, has made the astounding assertion: "An Indian man could call all day for help and no Buddhist would go out of the way to help him." The Good Samaritan, which is Christianity, is in India, and it is her hour to move forward.

Christian missionaries have taken the Gospel to the lowest of the low, in India, and it has lifted them. These lowest of the low are outside the pales of all of India's religions. They are beneath even the contempt of men of caste. They have not these restraining teachings concerning liquor, and have given themselves over to unrestrained vice. Into this heathenism the Christian missionary has dared to go with the Gospel of Christ. Wherever they have, by faith, taken hold in the power of the Spirit, it has lifted these people from their drunkenness and from their crime. Only the Christian religion in India cares what becomes of these outcasts. One of the professors of an American university, says this concerning them: "The outcaste and the animistic tribes are too low for the Hindu to touch. It is from these that Christianity is making the bulk of its converts. They are the prey of superstition, fears and ignoble customs, the slaves of impulse, with no defense in public opinion or cultured self-control against various forms of vice and temptation to which they are exposed. To make anything of such people might well seem hopeless, but many a missionary has wagered his life on the outcome, and the result is that all over India, in jungle and in city, a transformation is being wrought in the dregs of Hindu system which no one but the Christian missionary has dared to hope for."

Here, then, in the Christian missionary, is the hope of India. The quickest way to bring prohibition in India is to speed Christianity in India. Only then will India care what becomes of the downtrodden and the pitiable. If liquor continues in this country and the caste system is broken down, God pity this poor land! There is degradation here now, but degradation unheard of and unthought of will prevail here when these castes and religions weaken in the presence of modernism and revolt against authority. Over these broken dikes will flow the liquor scourge, more horrible than any plague that has struck India, and no one will care except Christians and those who have come under the spirit of Christianity for others.

Christ first preached in India, and all the blessing and reformations that have flowed out in other lands where Christ has been preached will flow forth in India.

Tampering with the Mainspring

A Plea for the Defense of the Bible and Its Vital Principles in Christian Education

never greater than today. The need for well-rounded characters was never more imperative. The Church, the guardian of morals, is in duty bound to oppose all the foes of religion, whether such foes be open or secret and whether the wrong done is intended or the result of erroneous views on fundamental subjects. The purpose of this article is to show how the Church's right and duty are being challenged.

When the mainspring is broken a watch ceases to be useful as a time-keeper. A handsome case may make it still an ornament and the parts may have a market value, but it cannot serve the purpose of a watch. There is that in each human life that corresponds to the mainspring of a watch—that which is absolutely necessary if the life is to be what it should be, a real life and not a mere existence. That necessary thing is a belief in God. Religion is defined as the relation between God and man, and Tolstoy has described morality as the outward expression of this inward relationship.

If it be true, as I believe it is, that morality is dependent upon religion, then religion is not only the most practical thing in the world, but the first essential. Without religion, viz., a sense of dependence upon God and reverence for Him, one can play a part in both the physical and the intellectual world, but he cannot live up to the possibilities which God has placed within reach of each human being.

A BELIEF in God is fundamental; upon it rest the influences that control life.

First, the consciousness of God's presence in the life gives one a sense of responsibility to the Creator for every thought and word and deed.

Second, prayer rests upon a belief in God; communion with the Creator in the expression of gratitude and in pleas for guidance powerfully influences man.

Third, belief in a personal immortality rests upon faith in God; the inward restraint that one finds in a faith that looks forward to a future life, with its rewards and punishments, makes outward restraint less necessary. Man is weak enough in hours of temptation, even when he is fortified by the conviction that this life is but a small arc of an infinite circle; his power of resistance is greatly impaired if he accepts the doctrine that conscious existence terminates with death.

Fourth, the spirit of brotherhood rests in a belief in God. We trace our relationship to our fellow men through the Creator, the Common Parent of us all.

Fifth, belief in the Bible depends upon a belief in God. Jehovah comes first; His word comes afterward. There can be no inspiration without a Heavenly Father to inspire.

Sixth, belief in God is also necessary to a belief in Christ; the Son could not have revealed the Father to man according to any atheistic theory. And so with all other Christian doctrines: they rest upon a belief in God.

For the purpose of this article, I speak of a belief in God only as it affects these six fundamental propositions, viz., consciousness of responsibility, communion with the Father, hope of immortality, confidence in the Bible, acceptance of Christ and the cultivation of the spirit of brotherhood.

IF BELIEF in God is necessary to the virtues enumerated, then it follows logically that anything that weakens belief in God weakens man, and, to the extent that it impairs belief in God, reduces his power to measure up to his opportunities and responsibilities. If there is at work in the world today anything that tends to break this mainspring, it is the duty of the moral, as well as the Christian, world to combat this influence in every possible way.

I believe there is such a menace to fundamental morality. The hypothesis to which the name of Darwin has been given—the hypothesis that links man to the lower forms of life and makes him a lineal descendant of the brute—is obscuring God and weakening all the virtues that rest upon the religious tie between God and man. Passing over, for the present, all other phases of evolution and considering only that part of the system which robs man of the dignity conferred upon him by separate creation—when God breathed into him the breath of life he became a living soul—I venture to call attention to the demoralizing influence exerted by this doctrine.

It undermines confidence in the Bible as an inspired revelation, as to creation, human conduct and man's hope for the future. There is not a word in the Bible that fits into the hypothesis of Darwin, just as there is not one fact in the universe that supports the hypothesis. A man may accept the Darwinian view after he has acquired a religious momentum sufficient to carry him through life, and he may continue to profess a belief in the doctrine without surrendering the religious ideas previously adopted, but he cannot begin with the Darwinian hypothesis and frame a conception of life that will meet man's needs.

There is nothing in the brute doctrine of descent to inspire either lofty purpose or high ideals. On the contrary, civilization is possible only in proportion as the doctrine of "the survival of the fittest" is abandoned, and the opposite doctrine of loving care for the weak is substituted for it. Darwin recognized this, and in his "Descent of Man" complained that, instead of eliminating the weak, as savages do, civilized man tries to prolong life and cares for the weak. He declared that this practice (of caring for the weak) impaired the race, but excused it on the ground that man's sympathy will not permit him to follow "hard reason" and continue in the course to which Darwin ascribes the rise of man from the lower animals.

THOSE who accept Darwin's views are in the habit of saying that it need not lessen their reverence for God to believe that the Creator fashioned a germ of life and endowed it with power to develop into what we see today, but this is even less than a half truth, and a half truth, it is said, may be worse than a lie. It is true that a God who could make man as he is, could have made him by the long-drawn-out process suggested by Darwin; and it is true that the God who could do the latter, would be as great as the God who could do the former—to do either would require infinite power, beyond the ability of man to comprehend; but that is not the real question.

What is the natural tendency of the doctrine? Is it likely to strengthen man's character? Or will it weaken the restraints that keep him from wrongdoing?

Will man's attitude toward Darwin's far-away God be the same as it is toward the God of Moses? Will the believer in Darwin's God be as conscious of God's presence

THE Christian religion is a heart religion. Its appeals are addressed to reason as well as to faith, but Christians believe that out of the heart are the issues of life. No education is complete that ignores the spiritual part of man. The case can be stated even more strongly. The need for heart development increases with the training of the mind, just as the rudder of a ship must have size and strength in proportion to the capacity of the vessel.

Christian schools of all denominations are intended to protect the student by supplying a life purpose powerful enough to control and properly direct all the energies of the mind and body. Such schools are more free than others to lay emphasis upon religious truths. They are, in fact, the only ones that can apply religious tests and thus surround the young with a wholesome environment at the most critical period in life.

The demand for full and complete education was in his daily life? Will he be as sensitive to God's will and as anxious to find out what God wants him to do?

Will the believer in Darwin's God be as fervent in prayer and as open to the reception of Divine suggestions? If God did not create man by separate act, and for a special purpose, when has He touched human life or laid His hand upon the destiny of race or nation? Elijah taunted the prophets of Baal, suggesting that their God might be asleep. Darwin mocks us more cruelly: he tells us that our God has been sleeping for millions of years. The estimates as to the time since life began upon the earth range from twenty-five million years to three hundred millions. Some evolutionists will not admit a creative act since electrons combined to form atoms or atoms combined to form matter. They conceal God's power behind an infinity of time; they avoid affirming His existence at all.

The inevitable tendency of this doctrine, when fully accepted, is to diminish reliance upon God and to dilute reverence with doubt. It puts reason above faith, the mind above the soul. It makes man a worshiper of the intellect—a more deadly form of idolatry than the worship of man-made images; it quenches the spirit, and discredits the heart, out of which are the issues of life. It transforms the Bible into a story-book and reduces Christ to the stature of a man.

Can the believer in Darwin's doctrine have as firm a faith in immortality as one who believes that man was made in the image of the Creator and placed on earth to carry out a divine decree? If there has been no break in the line of descent from the lowest form of life up to man, at what point in the development was man endowed with hope of a future life? Will the follower of Darwin carry all insects, reptiles, and beasts into immortality with man or will he deny immortality to man as well as to all life below him? How will the follower of Darwin graft the love of brotherhood upon the "fighting animal" if he has risen by overpowering and devouring?

IT IS useless to quarrel with the morals of a fact; truth must be accepted because it is truth, and the believer in God will fear no truth because he has faith in the wisdom and the love of God as well as in the power of God. But a hypothesis is not a fact—it is a guess. A hypothesis is not a truth—it is a suggestion, and has no value except as it is supported by facts. Facts and facts only can convert a hypothesis—a guess—into a truth, and the facts do not support the Darwinian hypothesis. The "missing links" have not yet been found although they have been searched for with a zeal that might have been better employed in an effort to bring man nearer to God. The press dispatches report a recent expedition to Africa; scientists are still trying to find facts to support an absurd hypothesis. If the hypothesis of Darwin were true, every foot of the earth's surface would furnish proof; we would find everywhere evidence of life in transition, but we find evidence of transition nowhere. Every living thing, except man, is perfect, and man is physically perfect. Everything but man is living up to its possibilities.

Dr. Etheridge, Fossilologist of the British Museum, says: "Nine-tenths of the talk of Evolutionists is sheer nonsense, not founded on observation and wholly unsupported by facts. This museum is full of proofs of the utter falsity of their views."

Prof. Beale, of King's College, London, says: "In support of all naturalistic conjectures concerning man's origin, there is not at this time a shadow of scientific evidence."

Prof. Fleishman, of Eriangen, says: "The Darwinian theory has in the realms of Nature not a single fact to confirm it. It is not the result of scientific research but purely the product of the imagination."

Darwin based his guess as to man's ancestry on the operation of two (so-called) laws—natural selection and sexual selection. The latter has been laughed out of the class-room and the former is being abandoned because it furnishes no adequate explanation of differences known to exist. No new explanations have been substituted for the ones that deceived Darwin, and yet many professors still teach Darwinism and spread its poison among the youth of our land—and this, too, in Christian colleges as well as in schools supported by taxation.

IF THE acceptance of a hypothesis does not affect conduct—either in the individual or in the mass—we need not concern ourselves about it. For instance, when a scientist, speaking of Honolulu a few years ago, announced that the Pacific Ocean was formed by the throwing off of the moon—basing his belief upon the similarity between the mountains in Hawaii and the mountains in the moon—no one felt that it made any difference whether his hypothesis was true or false. He could amuse his hearers without injuring their morals.

But when, last November, a college professor explained to a Philadelphia audience that we dream of falling because man's ancestors "fell out of trees fifty thousand years ago," it does make a difference whether the hypothesis is true. Man tries to square all of his ideas with his dominating belief. If he believes in the Bible account of man's creation, he will believe in God, and in prayer, and his belief in immortality and in brotherhood will be consistent with his belief in God and prayer. If, on the contrary, he accepts as his dominating belief the hypothesis that man is next of kin to the monkey, his whole philosophy of life will, in time, be brought in to harmony with this hypothesis.

The experience of George John Romanes furnishes an excellent illustration of what the doctrine of evolution will do for the student. Romanes (in a book prepared just before his death and published after his decease) explains how evolution led him away from his orthodox views while he was in college. He put his atheistic belief in book form and became an ardent supporter of Darwinism. He ceased to pray. Toward the close of his life he laboriously thought his way back to a belief in God, but, still clinging to the apostle of descent, he was never able to bring himself back to communion with God through prayer. He admitted in his first book "The appalling contrast between the hallowed glory of the creed that once was his" and "the lonely mystery of existence" into which evolution led him.

Evolution is the basis of higher criticism—a phrase used to describe the attacks of a school of critics who, starting out with the proposition that the Bible must be wrong because its account of Creation differs from the evolutionary hypothesis, proceed to eliminate all that is supernatural in it and to undermine the faith of their followers in its authority. They put the Bible on the operating table and cut out the parts that they think diseased. When they are through, it is no longer the Book of Books—it is "a scrap of paper."

Sir Robert Anderson, commenting upon the effect of higher criticism, says that it has dethroned the Bible in the home and that the old practice of family worship is rapidly dying out. He contends that great national interests are involved, that those who are trained in the fear of God will do their duty to their neighbors and be good citizens; that the dethronement of the Bible leads practically to the dethronement of SEVERAL thousand young men and women are being graduated from American colleges and universities this week and next. The season inevitably brings up the question of educational values; what education really consists of; what youth should know when it steps from the classic halls into the practical world. Our demand is for an increasing stress on religious training and religious thinking, and we asked Mr. Bryan to prepare for us an article outlining his convictions along this general line. Few men outside the ranks of the professional educator know the trend of collegiate thought better than this able publicist and sincere Christian, so his conclusions are especially valuable.

God. He points out the effect of this in Germany, America and England.

I HAVE stated what seem to be the logical results of Darwinism, but we do not need to rely upon our reason for a warning. We have the facts of history. Darwinism, carried to its logical conclusion, has given us Nietzsche with his super-man. Nietzsche cast aside the moral restraints of the environment that surrounded him in his youth and boldly denounced Christianity as the doctrine of degeneracy, and democracy as the refuge of the weakling. He denied the existence of God and rejected all standards of morality. He praised war, teaching that it is necessary to man's development, and he eulogized hatred because it leads to war. If you grant the truth of his foundation principle, namely, evolution as applied to man, you cannot escape his conclusions. His philosophy, if it is worthy the name of philosophy, is the ripened fruit of Darwinism—and a tree is known by its fruit.

Darwinism furnishes the basis for the growing antagonism in the industrial world. "The individual efficient for himself"—"the survival of the fittest"—is the quintessence of selfishness. It eliminates conscience and the spirit of brotherhood. Its motto is: "Each for himself and the devil take the hindmost."

Darwinism is causing so many business men to take their ethics from the jungle that civilized society must constantly devise new laws to protect the weak from gross injustice. In the United States pure-food laws have become necessary to keep manufacturers from poisoning their customers; child labor laws have become necessary to keep employers from dwarfing the bodies, minds and souls of children; anti-trust laws have become necessary to keep over-grown corporations from strangling smaller competitors, and we are still in a death grapple with profiteers and gamblers in farm products.

We have seen a generation's rivalry in battleships and militarism end in the bloodiest war in history, with nearly every great Christian nation involved. And these nations have not yet found a peaceful way of settling international disputes. Darwin's doctrine, amplified by Nietzsche, is largely to blame for the present international situation.

In 1900—over twenty years ago—while an International Peace Congress was in session in Paris the following editorial appeared in L'Univers:

"The spirit of peace has fled the earth because evolution has taken possession of it. The plea for peace in past years has been inspired by faith in the divine nature and the divine origin of man; men were then looked upon as children of one Father and war, therefore, was fratricide. But now that men are looked upon as children of apes, what matters it whether they are slaughtered or not?"

If the above utterance can be regarded as prophecy how completely it has been fulfilled during the past six years!

If we are to have world peace it must rest on the doctrine of brotherhood. It cannot be built upon terrorism, however pleasant that theory may be to those who harbor revenge, or however profitable it may be to those who manufacture munitions. Friendly co-operation, substituted for brute practices, will weld the world together and permit the conversion of swords into ploughshares. Faith in God should bring this about before the threat of universal bankruptcy compels it.

AS DARWINISM has led a multitude to reject the Bible, the rejection of Darwinism will bring many back to reliance upon the Bible as the Word of God. Some of our Christian leaders have tried to harmonize the Bible with Darwinism; it cannot be done. The acceptance of one will ultimately compel the rejection of the other. Which shall we choose?

Darwinism deals with nothing but life; the Bible deals with the entire universe—with its masses of inanimate matter and with its myriads of living things, all obedient to the will of the great Law Giver.

Darwin concerns himself with only that part of man's existence which is spent on earth, while the Bible's teachings cover all of life both here and hereafter.

Darwin begins by assuming life upon the earth; the Bible reveals the source of life and chronicles its creation.

Darwin devotes nearly all his time to man's body and to the points at which the human frame approaches in structure—though vastly different from—the brute; the Bible emphasizes man's Godlike qualities and the virtues which reflect the goodness of the Heavenly Father.

Darwinism ends in self-destruction. Its progress is suspended, and even defeated, by the very genius which it is supposed to develop; the Bible invites us to enter fields of inexhaustible opportunity wherein each achievement can be made a stepping-stone to greater achievements still.

Darwin's doctrine is so brutal that it shocks the moral sense—the heart recoils from it and refuses to apply the "hard reason" upon which it rests; the Bible points us to the path that is "like the shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

Darwin's doctrine leads logically to war and to the worship of Nietzsche's "Super-man;" the Bible tells us of the Prince of Peace and heralds the coming of the glad day when swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and when nations shall learn war no more.

Darwinism offers no reason for existence and presents no philosophy of life; the Bible explains why man is here and gives us a code of morals that fits into every human need.

TO THE Church schools we must look for leadership in the defense of the Bible and all the vital doctrines for which the Bible stands.

The great need of the world today is to get back to God—back to a real belief in a living God—to a belief in God as Creator, Preserver and loving Heavenly Father. When one believes in a personal God and considers himself a part of God's plan he will be anxious to know God's will and to do it, seeking direction through prayer and made obedient through faith.

The time calls loudly for a return to fundamental religious principles; they should be emphasized in the pulpit and they should not be contradicted in the schools. Where the Bible cannot be defended it should not be attacked. No amount of book learning can compensate for the undermining of the student's faith.

Man is the handiwork of the Almighty. He is superior to the beasts of the field, greater than any other created thing—but "a little lower than the angels." God made him for a purpose, placed before him infinite possibilities and revealed to him responsibilities commensurate with the possibilities. The Heavenly Father beckons man upward and the Bible points the way; man can obey and travel toward perfection by the path that Christ revealed, or man can disobey and fall to a level lower, in some respects, than that of the brutes about him. Looking heavenward, man can find inspiration in his lineage; looking about him he is impelled to kindness by a sense of kinship which binds him to his brothers. Mighty problems demand his attention; a world's destiny is to be decided by him. What time has he to waste in hunting for "missing links" or in searching for resemblances between his forefathers and the ape? In His Image—in this sign we conquer.

We are not progeny of the brute; we have not been forced upward by a blind pushing power; neither have we tumbled upward by chance. We are attracted to the Heavenly Father by the power of love—a power which finds its expression in Christ who promised: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me."

Making the School Building Safe

By H. COLIN CAMPBELL

ONE of the things we brag about in this country in support of the contention that we are the foremost of forward-looking nations is that education is compulsory. Compulsory attendance at school is the logical expression of public recognition of the fact that free education is the most powerful safeguard of our national institutions—the things which we as a nation stand for. It is in the public schools, if anywhere, that the seed of knowledge can be most effectively sown that will develop thorough appreciation for the meaning of liberty as we speak of it.

It is well that the vast majority of children of school age must attend school; but since this attendance is compulsory, it should follow that responsibility for the safety of these children is equally compulsory upon those who have placed these helpless human beings at the mercy of their superiors. No one who has reached the age of full citizenship can escape his participation of this responsibility. Regardless of the direct responsibility of legislative bodies, each member of the community must bear his share.

The disastrous Collinwood, Ohio, school fire several years ago, which resulted in the loss of life of more than 150 school children, has all but passed into history. The memory of it is revived now and then when a sporadic attempt is made on the part of some right-minded person to correct the lax conditions almost universal in schools throughout the country. Statistics show that there is a school fire somewhere in this country every day. A disastrous fire in a school building is a crime in which every citizen participates. It does not matter that only a few persons, or even but one, suffers injury directly or indirectly from any particular fire. The mere fact that it has happened, that some child suffered, does not relieve any individual of his responsibility for allowing conditions to exist that make such fires possible. One of the most pitiful attempts at justice that we occasionally witness is the fixing of a value on some human life by jury, in order that there may be a legal settlement of some particular case in question. A human life is invaluable since it can never be replaced or restored, so any money damages voted as compensation never can satisfy.

NINETY-FIVE per cent. of the school houses in the United States are either fire-traps or may easily be destroyed by fire. This statement comes from the National Committee for Chamber of Commerce Co-operation with Public Schools. There is only one possible excuse for this flimsy construction, so prevalent among school buildings. Today that excuse cannot seek defense in the arguments that might have prevailed in part during the past. Several years' stagnation in the construction industry has extended not only to homes, but to hotels, apartment buildings, office buildings, churches, schools and other structures, even including industrial plants, where human beings are sheltered or find quarters for some considerable period during every twenty-four hours. In the past one could partly excuse laxness by saying that lack of time prevented proper survey of conditions which might have resulted in the selection and adoption of a better type of building construction.

The inactivity of the past three or four years, therefore, in the building industry will have proved fortunate if the outcome from it takes the form of a determination to build better in the future than we have built in the past. So we have had lots of time to realize that we have not been building wisely. Low first cost has been the argument often advanced for the choice of non-fireproof construction. Public schools like other public buildings are public property. Their cost is borne by the taxpayers of the community. It is probably true that most such structures do not carry regular fire insurance. In some cases municipalities safeguard themselves against total loss by fire of the investment in such public property through creating a sinking fund which will take care of replacement either at the end of useful life or due to loss by fire. But no precautions that may be taken can safeguard against the loss of life so well as the precaution of building of the highest type of firesafe construction.

A school building, which is not only a menace throughout its life, but which year after year exacts its toll of further expense for maintenance is not the sort of an investment which the directors of a successful commercial institution would approve. Taxation is a right and necessity of a government having powers delegated by the people, but the delegation of such power carries with it a responsibility for its wise exercise. Expediency might sometimes point toward the selection of a structure low in first cost in order to secure approval of a proposed bond issue, but there is a very strongly implied bad faith on the part of those immediately responsible for school building projects when the argument of low first cost is advanced to defend the selection of a building material that means a firetrap. There is, therefore, more than one reason for building all school buildings of permanent fire-safe construction. Such a building constitutes the only means of discharging the grave responsibility of the community for the safety of its children and of protecting the public funds represented by the structure from being a total loss.

THE Fifteenth Annual Convention of the National Convention of Mothers' and Parent-Teachers' Associations but recently closed in Washington. Our national school situation, as viewed from the standpoint of the combustible school buildings throughout the country, impresses one with the grave importance of this organization in its ability to mold in proper direction various features of our educational systems, among which the necessity for good buildings is one. After all it is from the mothers of the country that we can expect the greatest interest in correcting the evil practices of the past. Now that suffrage is a privilege of the gentler sex, we can perhaps hope that the organization mentioned will concentrate its attention on securing much-needed laws for the protection, extension and perfection of our public-school system.

According to the report of the National Committee previously mentioned, there are now approximately one-half million children who are either on half-time, because of lack of school accommodations, or are housed in portables, rented buildings, attics, basements or corridors. It would require over 600 thirty-room buildings to properly house these children so that they could receive the full school-day of instruction to which they are entitled. Even then there would still remain overcrowded schoolrooms in other buildings, many of which have been in service for years and are entirely unsuited to their use.

The report referred to contains other important data in regard to the school-building situation. It says that only 5 per cent. of the school buildings now in existence may be classed as fireproof structures and that 30 per cent. of the city school-buildings in the United States are firetraps. This situation may not appeal to the rural dweller, who thinks that because the local school which his children attend is small and not overcrowded and permits easy egress in case of fire, he is not concerned with this alarming aspect. One should remember, however, that the tendency in the rural districts is

Results of True Education

A Discussion of the Elements of Character It Must Develop

WHAT is education? It may be defined this way:

Education is the development in every right direction of all the powers of the human being for the purpose of using those powers to make a better world.

On the basis of that definition, let us look at some of the results of this kind of education.

The first result of a true education is a deep sense of humility. We were born into a very great world and we can never learn very much about it. The last thing in the world that a student should entertain is a spirit of pride. The wisest people know very little compared with the vast amount of knowledge to be acquired. Around the substance called radium hundreds of eager minds in laboratories all over the world are at work and so far they have discovered very little. There are mysteries in the air, the water, the light and the common dirt under our feet which we have only just begun to discover.

Education means keeping the mind open as long as we live in order to learn about the great universe. There is no such thing as finishing one's education. We may be graduated from a school or college, but never from the university of experience. It is because some people, and unfortunately some ministers, teachers and professional men, stop learning that they stop being useful.

But true humility is the first result of a true education and by it we will understand an open mind, hungry and eager for new truth and larger truth. Every one can teach you something. There is no one in the world who can not teach someone else a lesson or impart some knowledge.

THE second great result of true education is a love of hard work. When some morning you wake up to find that you are hungry for the day's task and eager to face what has been an impossible situation, that may be the first sign to you that you have passed over the borderline from a student to the country of the scholar. Those who do things for the world, which need to be done, are not watching either the clock or the pay envelope all the time. The work which they are doing is greater than what they get for it, if it is worth doing at all. Those who have succeeded in helping the world up out of darkness into light have not been money grubbers or people who were jealous of giving the best they had in order to get results.

One of the most pitiful things about the present-day industrial condition is the fact that millions of workers have lost out of their lives the love of their work. They look upon it as a task which must be done, but they get no joy out of doing it. When the day's work becomes drudgery or monotony, the very heart of service is gone. Everyone has the experience of growing tired in doing the day's work, but one should not grow tired in doing it if it is necessary for the world's happiness that it should be done.

Real education puts into the heart and mind a joy in using the gifts of mind or the strength of body. Taken for granted that the work one is doing is necessary and worth-while, the love of it should always be a part of it. No man is truly educated who works his way through the world without the real joyous feeling in the day's labor. And it is a tragedy now being enacted all over the world when millions of men are embittered in one way or another with those who employ them over the matter of wages and hours. It may be there are great wrongs being done and great injustice in the industrial world, but in spite of all that the day's work which is not done with hearty eagerness and joy is not worth doing.

THE third result of true education is a clean life. A truly educated man or woman can not have bad habits. There are men and women who have been to schools and universities who have articles of culture in their homes, who have traveled around the world, but who have vicious habits of mind and body. I would not call such people educated. A truly educated person must be wholesome, must think straight and live straight.

A sound mind in a sound body is not only a good maxim, but it is the only definition which can rightfully be made of the development of the human being. To have a brilliant intellect and a dull moral consciousness is a contradiction and it is a mistake for any young man or woman to think that brilliant qualities of mind and intellectual power can ever wipe out the stain of an evil imagination or of an impure act. Conduct and intellectuality must go hand in hand or there is something wrong with the entire thing called education.

The fourth result of a true education is high ideals. The first thing that the average man does is to sneer at ideals. He says they will not work in the markets and they will not go in politics. What he means by that is sometimes if one acts from the highest motives he may lose money or fail to get elected to an office.

I remember one season visiting my old university and watching a baseball game between my old university and a visiting college. The game was very close and the interest intense. Near the end of the game a mis-play was made by one of our team which was not seen by the umpire, and what was called a run was registered and our team went off the field shouting victory. The captain of the team would probably have gone over the top any number of times to exhibit his physical bravery, but he did not have enough moral courage to go to the umpire and tell him to throw out the run because it was stolen instead of earned. It took the university a good many years to recover from that kind of athletics.

The high ideals that one carries into business or politics will not be carried in there unless they are formed during the period of education. A student who cheats in his examinations will cheat in his business or political life, and no man is truly educated who cheats and no man is truly educated who has no ideals in the

What Is the Use?

By DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

HE HAD degrees on the end of his name,
And knew several languages well;
He was listed in Who's Who's page of fame,
And he never was known to misspell;
But very few cried, they say, when he died,
And most folks were perfectly satisfied.

He played the piano with unusual skill,
And ranked as a genius in college;
Very difficult places he knew how to fill,
And his head was a storehouse of knowledge,
But he never smiled when he met a child,
And Love never spoke when his will was filed.

He ordered ten thousands of men to die,
And the crown of a king he wore;
And his wealth rolled up to the very sky,
And his greatness from shore to shore;
But widows of men will curse him again,
And when he is dead and buried—what then?

Yea, what is the use of power and fame,
If, when they are won, we are lost?
And what is the use of the world's acclaim,
If the Soul has to give up the ghost?
I would rather be known as obscure and alone, making of money or in the holding of power. There was a time once in the history of one of our largest cities in America when all the largest lawyers had been retained by a class of boodlers in the city government and a reform party which was trying to clean up the city was obliged to go somewhere else to get lawyers to defend their cases. These men were college graduates and supposedly educated. On the definition of education which we have made, they were pagans and had no right to the name of educated gentlemen.
Than wear bloody crown on a king's bloody throne.

THE fifth result of a true education is an independent spirit. Educated people who are truly educated, according to our definition, will do things which other people will not do. One of the greatest tests of an educated man or woman is the test of putting them into difficult positions and challenging them with seeming impossibilities. Where an uneducated person would fail or cowardly run away, an educated person will remain and wrest victory out of defeat. The mark of independence is the quality which has made reformers and it would be a very poor world without them. There are times in the life of an individual, a community or a nation when a person must stand all by himself for some great cause. Then the independent spirit comes to the front and reveals the difference between the coward and the brave man. No one is truly educated who does not have something of this independence, who is not afraid to use it in a time of emergency.

Another mark of a truly educated life is a sense of brotherhood. I may be a citizen of the state of New York, or of Kansas, so far as my birthplace or citizenship or voting place is concerned, but I am also a citizen of the whole world. No one is truly educated who has race prejudice or hates other people because they belong to another nationality, or who is indifferent to the troubles of other people because they do not live in his block. Every really educated person has a feeling of sympathy for all the people in the wide world and it is absolutely impossible for him to hate or despise or be indifferent to any other human being.

It is not possible to think of Jesus as being unwilling to sit down to a table and eat a meal with any kind of a human being in perfect friendship with them all. If you are in doubt concerning education, you do not have to ask whether you have ever been to college or have a degree, but you do need to have to ask whether you have race prejudice, or race feeling. It may be all right to say "America for Americans," but we must add in the next breath "America for all the rest of the world," if we are good citizens.

THE last great result of a true education, and the best of all, is religious convictions. There are a good many people who have been graduated from colleges, traveled around the world, accumulated wealth, who speak several languages, whose houses are full of works of art, whose libraries number thousands of books, who are not educated because they have no real love of God or man in their hearts.

Every truly educated person in the world must have a religious life. There is no such thing as true education without true religion. By religion I do not mean going to church, subscribing to certain articles of creeds, or wearing certain kinds of clothing. I mean what Jesus meant when He said: "We must love God and our neighbors as ourselves." That is religion in the highest sense and no college training, no book learning, no linguistic gifts, no travel, no culture, can take the place of a love of God and man. There are a good many pagans walking around in this world under the guise of educated people. They are not educated unless they have the great basic foundation in life of the creed of the Master.

These are some of the results of a true education. It is not necessary that a person should go to universities and colleges in order to get these results, but if they do have what is known ordinarily as a school education and come out from that course of study with their minds filled with knowledge from the laboratories, with a knowledge of language, history, mathematics, literature, economics and everything else, and do not have some or all of these results in some good degree, they can not be called educated people. And at the basis of it all is religion.

Education without religion is a farce and a failure. If the schools and colleges do not teach the great fundamentals of conduct, and of the right relations of men to their neighbors, of common justice and honor in the market-place, of an absence of race feeling and prejudice, if they do not teach peace instead of war, and love instead of hate, and service instead of self, they are pagan institutions with no right to an existence and the tax-payers' money is wasted upon them. The people of America have the right to demand that those who teach should teach essentials of human conduct no matter what else they teach. If they do not teach conduct and character, they are pagan and not Christian.

THE care which is exercised in many colleges and universities to keep the students in close touch with church work and with religious influences is well illustrated by an account of such work at Cornell University, contributed by E. J. Walenta. Five denominations are working in co-operation with the Cornell University-Christian Association, each having its own student-pastor who maintains an office in the C. U. C. A. building, Barnes Hall.

In this building committees of students of each church meet on registration day and to them go the registration slips of the freshmen telling church membership or preference. In the case of the Episcopal Church, which Mr. Walenta takes as an example, the names are copied in alphabetical order and then another list is arranged according to the section of the city in which the student is to live. A letter of welcome is sent at once to each new Episcopalian student and a night or two later some member of the committee calls upon him and extends an invitation to the student-service at the church on Sunday morning. Following this service a breakfast is served in the church basement at which the students get to know each other. Another means of tightening the church bonds is the frequent "open house" of the student-pastor.

A June Bride in Central Africa

At Least Two Years Must Be Devoted to a Shulla Courtship

By DEMAREE C. BESS

JUNE days in Central Africa are often cool and pleasant, because June and July are the "winter months" of that region. That time of year is the best for hearing the stories of Mrs. David S. Oyler, wife of the American missionary at Dolieb Hill, in the Egyptian Sudan, whose note-books are filled with the lore of the little-known Shulla negro tribe. Twenty years ago, white men had no knowledge of that large tribe's language or literature or customs. Then American missionaries penetrated Shulla land on a house-boat, settled down among the friendly natives, and began to write down their unrecorded language, and to glean from them, bit by bit, their folk lore, their simple literature, their traditions, their dim religious beliefs.

Mrs. Oyler has filled many note-books with the facts gathered as she and her husband have traveled about for eight years through the acorn-topped villages of the Shulla country. Since they have mastered the simple Shulla language, the natives tell them everything they ask. One of the most interesting chapters in those note-books to me was that on marriage customs. For the primitive black folk have evolved a system of marriage customs which are even more rigidly observed than those of our own civilized country. And the rigamarole extending over a period of two years which a Shulla youth must pass through in order to win his first wife—and usually his last—would very likely exhaust the patience of our own civilized youths.

Mrs. Oyler told me one day about the marriage of her two young friends Ku and Agula, young people whom she had known almost since the beginning of her residence in the Shulla country. They had themselves told her the complete story of their engagement, which was very similar to others among the Shullas.

ONE day Ku's "eye was hot," which meant that he was in love, and wanted to get married. So he went to his best friend Awaki and said frankly enough, "I want to get married." Awaki laughed, and said, "Why, whom do you want to marry?" Ku knew very well the girl of his choice, but tribal custom prescribed that he should answer, "Oh, I don't know. Let's take a walk, and I will find a girl."

So the two strapping young men went to the river for a bath, then greased their bodies liberally with oil and butter, put on all their ivory and elephant-hair and giraffe-tail bracelets, and such others as they could borrow from their friends. In this informal fashion, Awaki was made the "best man" for Ku, whose principal duty would be to look after his financial interests.

Ku and Awaki went walking, Ku seeing to it that they walked in the right direction, and soon they met Agula. They greeted her formally enough, and she asked them, "Where are you going?" "Oh, we are just out for a walk," Ku answered nonchalantly. "But where are you going?" Agula persisted. Thus urged, Ku replied "I am looking for a girl to marry." Agula pretended intense surprise. "Why, whom do you wish to marry?" Ku's "hot" eye looked at her. "I wish to marry Agula."

Agula, a fine muscular girl, almost as strong as Ku himself, was pleased. So she invited the young men to her home in the nearby cluster of acorn-topped huts, and asked them to be seated just outside the house-opening. Then she hurried to a neighbor's house, to borrow food for the visitors, because she did not have anything fine enough for them in her own hut. Her best girl friend, to whose house she ran, expressed surprise when she saw her come running, although she had seen the young men. "Why, why do you hurry so?" she asked. "I have travelers in my home," said Agula. "You must come to help me."

When the two girls had set borrowed food before the young men, Agula ran to the river for a bath, greased her lithe young body thoroughly, and put on all her own finery, which naturally did not compare with that of the young men, because she was only a girl. Then, properly attired, she took her seat beside the two young men, and talked of many things. Finally, Ku formally renewed his suit, and she told him to return on a certain day.

On the specified date, the two young men went again to her village, and were well fed. At the close of the meal, Agula told Ku that he must present his case to "the old men of the village," which simply meant her father. Ku, upstanding and vigorous, able to hunt well, to fish, and to plant if necessary, suited Agula's father very well. "You may have Agula for the usual price," her father told Ku. "I shall ask only the usual ten cows." Ku had been elated by a rumor that the new king of the Shullas planned to reduce the cost of a wife, but the king had established the old rate of ten cows. So Ku arranged with Agula's father to make the first payment of two cows in the near future.

When Ku had led his two cows to the village, and had turned them over to Agula's father, there came the first celebration. For two days they feasted and danced with the people of the whole village. To it good. Then the village, divided into three groups of old men, young men and women, gathered together, and ate. Toward evening, after the village had gorged to contentment, they sought out Ku and Agula, placed them together in the middle of the village, and danced gaily around them, singing their praises.

The next day, Ku killed a sheep for Agula and her friends, and the village again feasted. Then the visiting girls prepared food sufficient for all the people of the village, and went home. And now the young people must wait for another full year, before the ceremony could be resumed.

At the close of the second year, Agula, with only a few selected girl friends this time, went again to Ku's village, with baskets of food, and once more the old men gathered to inspect it. Then a sheep was brought, and prayed over, just before it was killed. Its ears were cut off, beads were sewed on them, and one ear was tied to Agula's ankle while the other was tied to Ku's ankle. Then each of the guests took as much water as he or she could hold in the palm of one hand, spit into it, and threw it on Ku and Agula. Then the bride and groom led the way to one of the best houses in the village, where a bath had been prepared. Ku was taken into the house and bathed. Then the women bathed Agula. Then the marriage party proceeded to a second house, and Agula was given some oil with which to anoint Ku.

Agula's girl friends and the people of the village worked all during the night preparing the marriage feast, which was served early the next day, a sort of wedding breakfast. As each friend of Agula's started home the next day, Ku and Agula gave a present to her, and she was lavish in her praise of their generosity. When the bride and groom had given presents to all their friends, the ceremony was complete: Agula remained with Ku in his village, and after he had completed payment of the ten cows, was his property.

THE marriage of Ku and Agula ran along smoothly enough, although it must have seemed a slow process to the impatient young people. But many Shulla engagement ceremonies are not so happy. Complications arise quickly if the girl says "No" when the young man first makes his offer. Perhaps she is only wanting to be coaxed, or perhaps she fears that if she appears too anxious, her father will stubbornly refuse to permit the match. If the girl says "No" decisively, however, the young man usually gives up the quest—and seeks to invest his ten cows elsewhere.

But sometimes the young man, although the girl may hate him, stands well with the father. Then the father is angry, and promises the young man that he will compel his daughter to reverse her decision. If she is strongly opposed to the young man, and her father persists in ordering her to marry him, she must pass through three tests or "ordeals." First, her men relatives beat her with cow-ropes until she is badly bruised. If this does not change her mind, she is wrapped in a fish-net, and put into the river until she is unconscious; then they take her out, and revive her. If she persists then in her refusal, she is imprisoned in a sealed house, with a smoky fire, and left. If the girl has the endurance to pass through these ordeals, the father cannot compel her further. The tests, however, are so difficult, that few girls have the strength to endure them.

Sometimes, when the girl is most eager to marry a certain young man, her father emphatically says "No!" Usually that ends the matter. Sometimes the girl, much in love, may persist, but the father offers a prayer, putting a curse on the girl.

Divorce among the Shullas is very largely a matter of taking back a bad bargain. The man has the right to divorce the woman, but she does not have the right to leave him unless all the dowry has been returned by her father. If the girl is a poor housekeeper, her husband may return her to her father, and demand his money back; if the wife runs away, the husband may divorce her, and demand back his cattle. If a woman dies childless, her father must either give back the ten cows, or provide a new wife for his son-in-law.

each of Agula's parents, and to her brothers and sisters, Ku gave a sheep as a gift. Two of Agula's sisters had died, but Ku gave sheep to their departed spirits, which were taken and eaten by the parents. Awaki, Ku's best man, danced during these two days with Agula's girl friend, who assumed the part of "bride's-maid."

AND NOW, for a whole year, the ceremony was dropped. Ku and Agula saw something of each other, as they occasionally met in their walks over the level marshes and through the scrubby African woods, but they did not "keep company" as in our land. At the end of the year Agula, with a number of her girl friends, carefully prepared tempting food, placed it in baskets, and went to Ku's village. On the way they pretended, according to custom, that they were lost, and wandered about until some one from the village discovered them, and led them to Ku's house. Arrived there, they refused to enter the house enclosure until they had been given a hoe. Then they refused to place their baskets of food on the ground until they had been given another hoe. Then they declined to carry the food into the house until a fish-spear had been given to them, and found it impossible to taste any food before Ku had given them a sheep.

The next morning they gathered wood, and prepared the food. All of the old men of Ku's village assembled, carefully inspected the food, and pronounced

The Soul of the Nation

WHAT America fought for in the War has been variously discussed by speakers and writers lately. In a few notable instances the attempt has been made to show that this nation went into the world conflict solely to defend its own interests, and that the broader purpose of rescuing civilization from collapse had nothing to do with it. Such, however, is not the view of the American people, nor of their real leaders today; nor was it their view at that memorable time when their sons so nobly responded to the call to save civilization from shipwreck.

President Harding, on the Sunday preceding Memorial Day, worshiped in the historic church of Pohick, Virginia, of which our first President was once a member. He sat in the Washington box pew, and after the service addressed the congregation by invitation. That the President held the broader view was clearly made manifest in the course of his address. While he disclaimed any intention to launch out into a discussion of the cause of the war, President Harding declared that "America fought to preserve the rights of the Republic and to maintain the civilization of which we had such a part in the making; and in that service we have rendered tribute not only to that cause but also to the highest ideals of humanity."

Again, in his Memorial Day address at the Arlington National Cemetery, the President recurred to the same theme; "Wherever men are free, they are wont to give thought to our country's services in freedom's cause. Where men may aspire to a freedom not yet achieved, their instinct turns the eye and the thought of hope this way and they pray that their cause may gain our approbation. . . . They have seen our protecting arm stretched over the outposts of liberty on every continent. For more than a century our plighted word warned tyranny from half the world; then, when the gage was taken up by mad ambition, men felt the blow that arm could strike when freedom answered in its utmost might. Across the seas we sent our hosts of liberty's sons, commissioned 'to redress the eternal scales' . . . Now our Memorial Day is become an international occasion; it calls upon the fortunate free of many lands and countries to help in its observances, and equally to them and us it is a reminder of our common troth to civilization, humanity and everlasting justice."

Referring to our own interests as a nation, he said: "I counsel no selfishness, no little Americanism, no mere parochialism, when I urge that our first duty is to our own, and that in the measure of its performance we will find the true gage of our capacity to be helpful to others." Then, toward the conclusion of his brilliant oration, he said: "We believe that the torch will flame more brightly in our hands, that we will hold it safe and high aloft, and that its light will help, at least, to point the way for humanity on the path of safety and in the task of building for all time!"

These utterances by the President, which accurately express the sentiments of the American people as a whole, might profitably be pondered by those who have not hesitated to attribute to the nation views it never held concerning the war. Such men do a disservice when they stir up a conflict of discussion over a matter that should have been regarded as too sacred to be made a target for partizanship. It was clearly in President Harding's mind to forestall such discussions in future when he spoke in the Virginia church and at Arlington as he did, and we take it that he means it to be well understood what that purpose is. At this late date, to spread the assumption that the United States had no aim beyond the selfish one of serving its own interests, is a libel upon the whole nation and a gross misconception of the spirit of America, whose heroic sons gave their life's blood to make the whole world "a better place to live in."

Yes, the nation has a soul, and it found expression in the war. We did not seek glory or conquest, but justice and righteousness. And we will continue to seek these until we have done all that lies within our power to attain them.

"Adequate Armament"

IN a recent magazine article entitled "What is Adequate Armament?" Hayne Davis, who was an interested spectator at the Hague Conference of 1907, and a friend of President Roosevelt, says, "Armament should be in proportion to known dangers." He then goes on at length to argue for a "naval armament which will give us an unquestionably superior power in the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, adjacent to our territories and possessions."

But he fails to state what the exact armament should be, and at no point in his article does he define what the "known dangers" are, or how large the armament should be to protect America from them.

The American people are not visionary about the need of some kind of a police and protective force on the seas, at this time in the history of the world. Neither does the average citizen minimize the facts that have to do with the world powers, in their suspicion and fear of one another. But the average tax-paying citizen of the United States has a right to know how far the naval experts propose to go in spending the people's money for armament, and a good many of them want to know what the "known dangers" are, if those are the basis of the armament this country needs to protect herself against attack.

What are the "known dangers" that confront America at the present moment and which require a navy of "unquestionably superior power in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans"? Come, gentlemen of the Navy, speak up, and tell us in plain United States language what these dangers are. We are from Missouri, and Kansas, and Illinois, and Ohio, and New York, and a lot of other states of the Union, and we would be interested in knowing the facts. If there are "known dangers" let us know what they are. Thousands of us are good patriotic citizens, who love our country just as much as the naval enthusiasts, and all we want to know is on what you base your demand for the greatest navy on earth, as a good many of you do. If there are "known dangers," why keep the matter a secret? If Japan is really waiting for a chance to attack the United States and you are in possession of the facts to prove it, by all means give the people the facts. But if you have no facts to prove these "known dangers" why keep on inflaming the public mind by continuing the same propaganda of fear and suspicion and jealousy that have filled the world for centuries?

There is an increasing number of taxpayers, and the number is rapidly growing, who are growing very tired of the magazine writers who are anxious for an "adequate armament," and who write long and elaborate articles for it, but fail to state in the articles just what the danger is that requires the enormous expense. For more than a quarter of a century certain writers and speakers have picked out Japan as the menace to our national security. Give us the facts, gentlemen. We have had suspicion and fear instilled into us long enough. A quarter of a century has failed to prove to a good many of us that Japan is an enemy of the United States. Is she the "known danger" you keep mentioning in your magazine articles? Pound your typewriters to give us facts. We have had enough of "fear."

Young Souls Neglected

THAT our modern educational methods do a grievous wrong to childhood in cutting off the Bible in a large proportion of the schools has been many times demonstrated, but probably never so startlingly as in an example recently brought to our attention. In an address in one of the leading Brooklyn churches a few days ago, District Attorney Lewis told his audience of a recent test made in a public school in that city to ascertain how many of the pupils were familiar with the Ten Commandments. Of the 1,373 pupils questioned, 499 admitted that they did not know the Commandments, while 351 had never heard of them. The District Attorney gave some of the answers made by the pupils when asked to repeat the Decalogue. A few of these are worth noting.

"The first commandment is 'There shall be light,'" was the reply of one student.

"The Ten Commandments were the ten amendments to the Constitution," said another.

"There shall be water," was the answer given by a third to the same question.

Still other children declared that the first commandment was "Children must keep off the steps of street cars."

"Not to swear for anything;"

"Don't crook anything;"

"Thou shall not hit thy father or mother;"

"Don't swindle."

In concluding his remarkable statement the District Attorney declared that the test had convinced him of the need of some sort of religious and moral training for a child better than any system we now have. It is a disgrace for our boasted civilization that we should be guilty of permitting any child in our land to grow up in ignorance of the Bible, and especially those portions of it that are essential in the formation of character. By excluding the Bible from the schools, millions of the young are deprived of all knowledge of the greatest Book in the world, familiarity with which would implant the love of all the virtues and graces of heart and mind that make for noble and useful manhood and womanhood and the best type of citizenship.

While sectarian teaching and special spiritual instruction are the proper task of the Church, the Sunday School and the home, the Bible should have an honored place in the schools for its unapproachable literary value, its moral teachings and its power to plant and cultivate in young minds all of the qualities that are most worthy of attainment in human life and experience.

Let the Bible have free course! It is God's message to man. Our children need it as they need air, exercise and food. It is almost unthinkable that we should open the Bible in the schools in heathen lands, and yet exclude it in those of our own.

A New Bible?

MR. H. G. WELLS, the English novelist and of late a notable historian, is quoted as saying the world needs a new Bible, one that is written to meet present-day needs, in present-day language, with modern application. The field is open to any one who wishes to write such a Bible, and the Christian Herald ventures to suggest that Mr. Wells himself try his hand at it. There is no law to prevent any writer or philosopher or historian getting up a new Bible and offering it to the world. It might be an interesting experiment to make, if a dozen novelists like Mr. Wells combined with as many more philosophers, scientists, theologians and poets to write such a Bible as Mr. Wells says the world needs now.

Far be it from us to suggest even an outline of such a new Bible to the versatile compiler of a World Outline of History. But we have been wondering a little since reading Mr. Wells's statement what new matter he would use in creating his new Bible. We hesitate to suggest even that the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule are back numbers and something better ought to take their place! And when it comes to Paul's writings on immortality and his treatise on the greatest thing in the world, called Love, it seems almost superfluous to suggest even that a combination of modern writers might easily find something more up to date than either immortality and love with which to make this new Bible the best seller in the market!

Also when it comes to dealing with such homely and every-day themes as sin and the consequences of it, with man's need of God and his redemption from evil, it hardly seems quite the gracious thing even to hint that a combination of modern writers like Mr. Wells can easily find some better way to treat the entire subject of man's transgression and his way out than the old Bible gives us!

It will also be a very interesting thing to watch the making of this new and modern Bible when the writers of it give to the modern reader some story more interesting and valuable than the old, old story of Jesus Christ. If the old Book is so worn out as some people seem to think it is, here is a chance for the imagination and genius of modern poets and theologians and writers to create a story that will entrance the world as it never has been entranced by the story of the Redeemer of the world. What a wonderful Bible this new Bible will be when it is made to order to fit present-day needs and present-day theology and present-day sins! What a revelation of the poor thing the world has had all these years in this old Bible which has become too antique to fit the needs of the twentieth century! How breathless we all ought to be as we wait for the publishing of this new revelation! What a seller it will be for the publisher who is fortunate enough to get out a copyright on it!

Go to it, all ye writers and social reformers and new theologians! There is nothing to hinder you from getting up a better and more up-to-date book than the old Bible! That is, there is nothing to hinder, except the impossibility of modern brains and souls and imaginations to perform such a task. If Mr. Wells and all the rest of the modern writers do not believe this, let them write the Bible they say the world needs. Meanwhile the modern preacher need not wait for this modern Bible to get texts that will fit the modern world. The old Bible still has several texts that fit very well every human condition, and will do so for a number of centuries to come.

And in this connection it might be well for those who are tired of the old Bible to remember what the Master said: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

Senate Passes Naval Bill Carrying Total of $494,000,000

FOREIGN observers are apt to wonder somewhat regarding the attitude of the United States Senate on disarmament. When a theoretical question of disarmament was before it, the Senate voted unanimously for the calling of a conference designed to reduce armaments on the seas, but when on the practical issue of appropriations it passed a bill carrying $494,000,000 for the maintenance of America's sea forces in the next fiscal year and for the continuation of the 1916 building program. This was only a very slight reduction in the total reported by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs and was $98,000,000 more than was carried in the Naval bill as it was passed by the House.

Party lines were ignored in the final vote of 54 to 17, with 38 Republicans and 16 Democrats voting for the bill while 5 Republicans and 12 Democrats opposed it. One of the hardest fights of the protracted debate over the measure came on a motion to recommit it to the committee with instructions to reduce the total to the House figures but this was defeated by a vote of 43 to 25. Opponents of the bill assailed it as "reckless extravagance" and declared business conditions in America made imperative economy in federal expenditures, but their arguments were overruled by the majority.

A hard fight between the Senate and House conferees was anticipated and it was said the House leaders were determined that the naval appropriations should be trimmed down to the $396,000,000 on which they decided originally.

Disarmament Feelers Put Out

THAT President Harding has instituted "informal feelers" to ascertain whether it would be feasible to bring about an international conference to devise means for the limitation of naval armaments has been disclosed at the White House. Just what means of sounding out the Powers has been adopted was not revealed and no intimation was given whether any responses had been received. The first move by the President was said to have preceded the passage of the Borah disarmament amendment in the Senate and to be on a broader scale than that declaration contemplated not being limited to Japan and Great Britain.

In this connection the New York Times carried an interesting story for which there has been no official confirmation. It declared that the disarmament feelers were being put out through Col. George Harvey, the American representative on the Allied Supreme Council, and that President Harding was planning to make the association of nations of which he spoke so often in the campaign an outgrowth of the Supreme Council. If the Supreme Council demonstrates its capacity to keep the world's peace, according to this story, it would be developed gradually so as to take over the outstanding functions of the League of Nations and would be coupled with an international court of justice to be created. Such a course would obviate the necessity of calling an international conference to draft a constitution for a new association of nations and of obtaining the Senate's ratification of a new covenant. Whether a new international organization can be built up in this way must be in doubt for a considerable period, but the suggestion at least has the merit of being a more direct approach to the problem than many of the other methods proposed.

Many Killed in Tulsa Race War

A RACE war which raved in horrors those dreadful conflicts in East St. Louis, Omaha and Chicago, has swept over Tulsa, Okla., intensifying racial antagonisms and imposing a toll of human life which must appal all thinking persons in America. Thirty persons—nine whites and twenty-one negroes—are known to have been killed, and some estimates of the number of dead ranged as high as eighty-five. Two hundred were wounded. Ten blocks of homes in the negro quarter were destroyed by incendiaries, with a property loss of $1,500,000, leaving 3,000 homeless.

The conflict started over the arrest of a negro accused of a crime against a white girl. He was taken to the Court House and lodged in the jail on the upper floor. Rumors of an attempt to lynch him apparently were circulated and armed negroes made their way to the Court House until 200 were around the building. Crowds of white men also gathered and those who were unarmed broke into shops and supplied themselves with weapons. With city and county officials taking no action, a clash was inevitable and was not long delayed. After several clashes the negroes retreated to their own quarter, which was invaded by the pursuing white men, and the fighting assumed the proportions of a battle, with the number engaged on both sides running into the thousands. The homes of negroes were set on fire and the fire department was prevented from attempting to cope with the flames.

Meanwhile the militia had been called out and restored order in the business section, but it was several hours before the troops were in force sufficient to disperse the rioters in the negro quarter. Martial law was declared, guardsmen were scattered throughout the city with machine guns ready for action, and orders were issued for the immediate arrest of all persons carrying arms.

Thousands of negroes fled from their quarter as the fighting began and others gathered up as fugitives or combatants were taken to improvised camps where they were kept under armed guard with civic organizations and citizens providing food and medical care for them. There was a tremendous revulsion of feeling and the one bright spot in the situation was the manner in which the better elements of Tulsa hastened to organize relief measures for the negro victims and to raise funds for the reconstruction of the homes destroyed.

Railway Wages Cut $400,000,000

WAGE reductions averaging 12 per cent. and expected to effect a saving of $400,000,000 a year for the railroads of the country have been announced by the United States Railroad Labor Board in accordance with its decision of several weeks ago. The new scales, which become effective on July 1, affect the members of 31 labor organizations employed by 104 railroads, but the Board announced that the same reductions will be granted to the other lines, so that all railroad workers in the country are involved. The Association of Railway Executives estimated the number of men ultimately affected at 1,700,000 as against 2,056,381 affected by the pay increase of July, 1920. The reduction in the personnel means an annual saving of $700,000,000 for the companies, so that the total reduction in the annual labor expense is $1,100,000,000.

The heaviest cut was that of 18 per cent., or 8½ cents an hour, in the pay of maintenance-of-way laborers, wiping out the increase granted a year ago. Switchmen and shops crafts were reduced 9 per cent., train service men 7 per cent., and car repairers about 10 per cent.

Some railroad executives expressed disappointment that greater reductions had not been made. Union leaders withheld comment, but it was predicted the unions would accept the new scale. The "Big Four" brotherhoods have called a meeting for July 1 to discuss the award.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has been working on a revision of freight rates and has before it for review many applications for reductions in rates filed as the result of agreements between railroads and shippers. President Harding made a call at the Commerce Commission offices to discuss the subject of rate reductions and readjustments and there was a belief the wage reduction would permit a lowering of traffic charges.

Central American Union Approved

THE Central American countries of Honduras, Guatemala, Salvador, Costa Rica and Nicaragua, which originally were one, have been endeavoring for some time to get together in a Central American Union which will enable them to co-operate more effectively. The three states first named have formally approved the compact and Costa Rica is about to do so, her regular Congress already having approved it. Nicaragua alone has held back, fearing her entrance into the Union might in some way involve her rights under the Bryan-Chamorro treaty by which the United States has an option of building an interoceanic canal across Nicaragua.

Secretary Hughes, at a luncheon in Washington in honor of Maximo H. Zepeda, the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister, who has been in the United States for several months, heartily endorsed the proposed Union and predicted that "important advantages would accrue through united effort in the field of common interest." This approval, it was predicted, will hasten Nicaragua's entrance, as it has been made plain that Nicaragua would lose no rights under the treaty.

The countries which have ratified the Union desire to have everything ready so it will be proclaimed on September 15, the one hundredth anniversary of their independence. Such an experiment in amalgamation, after a considerable period of separation, will be watched with interest by the world.

Fresh Clashes in Silesia

NEW battles on any considerable scale have been averted in Upper Silesia, but there have been conflicts between the Germans and French and between the Germans and Poles which emphasize the tenseness of the situation and the necessity for an early settlement of the boundary question.

One of these clashes occurred at Buethen, within the area occupied by the Polish invaders, when forces organized by the German inhabitants of the town and estimated at 3,000 attacked the French garrison. The situation was complicated by the presence of Polish forces around the city, but the news dispatches indicated that the French commander refused their proffers of aid, kept the Poles from entering the town, and restored order with his own men. The French used tanks in the fighting, according to reports, and suffered no losses, while those of the Germans were heavy.

A more formidable engagement was between the Germans and the Poles near Gross Strehlitz, where the Poles were compelled to retreat, leaving 130 dead on the field. Other clashes were on a small scale. Inter-Allied officers in Silesia tried to obtain an agreement for the establishment of a neutral zone between

God's Witness to Service

A Sermon by S. PARKES CADMAN, D.D.*

TEXT—Eph. 5:10, 11. "Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord, and having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness."

SOCRATES anticipated George Fox by teaching within certain limitations the doctrine of the inner light, and by claiming to be a living illustration of its presence and potency. Most of us are familiar with the self-revelation of the illustrious Greek when he told the judges who condemned him to die that a spirit dwelt in him and made its voice heard in restraint and reproof whenever he was about to enter upon a wrong course of action. But though the ghostly visitor warned Socrates against what was ill-fated, it did not show him what was obligatory and virtuous. It told him what he ought not to do, but alas! it was dumb as to what he must do. His experience was curiously one-sided, possibly because his nature, although singularly exalted, lacked the confident aggressiveness of the devoted religionist.

Many share the disability of the noblest philosopher of the ancient pagan world. Keenly aware of the forbidden things of life, averse to the practices which reason and morals alike castigate, nevertheless the majority are somewhat puzzled as to what policy in affairs great or small is just, wise, vital, and approved of God.

All agree that it is well worth-while to have a widely diffused and clearly defined determination of what men and nations must not be and must not do. Not so many by any means are held in a common conviction as to what men and nations are bound to become and to effect. The standards of affirmative and constructive action are obscured in the public apprehension. Ideals which one group extols are severely denounced by another group. Confusion was seldom more prevalent in politics, in social measures, in ecclesiastical institutions than it is at the present moment.

CHRISTIANITY leads us to expect something infinitely higher and better than the contentions which afflict the nations. It deals with a race which can never be content with a series of mere inhibitions, and which will soon resent a monotonous undertone of admonition. And it deals with that race uncompromisingly, exacting as the first condition of divine guidance and approbation, the unquestioning obedience of men and women. For my part, I am satisfied that this should be as it is; that in the fluctuating welter of earthly wisdom one unmistakable scheme, packed with divinity, sanctioned by the past, and competent to solve the problems of the present, is found in the New Testament doctrine and ethic.

The first unfolding of the Gospel reveals that Love which is the indisturbable foundation of Life; the Love surpassing human thought, arranging and dominating all existence, ordering its progress toward a rational goal. The pithy phrase of St. John's Gospel covers the case. God is Love, and, protected by the splendid magnitude of His affection, we can so act as to win His favor. Certainly He will do something more than pull the check-rein when His offspring take a perilous turn. He presides over the universal destiny for far more than preventive purposes. He proposes to align us, not simply for safety, but for righteousness.

Earthly love is ever eager to show its pleasure toward the object of its desire. It revels in commendation and encouragement, and its native speech is charged with sympathy and understanding. It leaps to recognize in the loved one what is meritorious and exaggerates the good qualities which a colder inspection would minify. The austere affection which cannot shape its message in good cheer is abnormal. Here and there a parent is glacial, reticent, and harsh. No warm blood rules the heart; codes are prescribed for the child with forbidding insistence. Without a hint of tenderness and paternal grace, the unfortunate youth who wilts under this frosty treatment must measure up to the tasks which exceed his capacity. James Mill was such a parent—harsh, grim, inexorable, willing to use his gifted son, John Stuart, as a living peg on which to hang the father's theories of education. The outcome was the needless mutilation of one of the finest intellects of the past four centuries.

In utter contrast to this learned cruelty the Being whom Jesus proclaimed is lavish of praise and co-operation. We may prove to our sorrow what is odious in His sight. But we may also prove to our eternal joy what is well-pleasing to Him. Nor does He withhold from us the riches of His nature. There is nothing of parsimony in His distribution of gifts. They are abundant beyond imagination, with no boundaries except those which our personal limitations impose upon them.

He is, indeed, the Father of lights, with Whom is no variableness or shadow cast by turning.

NOT a little of the doubt and difficulty confronting us is due to the fact that we are never quite sure we are not gambling against a melancholy Fate. If men could only be confident that they have the blessing of their Creator, the world's travail would cease, its prospects brighten, its warfare end. But factions strive, and wisdom is darkened by a cloud of words because we lack the witness of the Indwelling Deity whose strength is all-sufficient for our necessities. Place the pupil in an untoward position with his instructor and he will shrink before the pressure he dreads. The servant becomes as sour as the mistress who does not realize that a kind word is as important in its place as the monthly wage. The workman who receives no tribute of honest praise from his employer is ripe for rebellion. The home, the school, the forge, the factory, the office, are far more dependent for efficiency upon good-will than is ordinarily supposed. Personal contact, gracious bearing and comprehensive treatment are not the stuff which economic writers are apt to purvey, but they are vastly more requisite than dawning has begun. Hazardous guesses and precarious speculations vanish; the spirit's motives and deeds reach an unusual elevation; they attain a dignity and an influence which cannot be gainsaid. Enoch had the testimony that he pleased God; Abraham believed the word of his Maker and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness. Some interpreters of the economies of grace maintain that men can not know what Enoch knew, can not obtain that which Abraham received. These prophets of a legalistic theology inform us that man has no provision of his future, that he must be prepared to wait for the approval of God until another life shall reveal it.

I would not trespass on the jurisdiction of that last decree, wherein the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed. But I am not persuaded that martyrs have burned, and patriots suffered persecution unaided by the sustentation of God's presence and approval. Behind the statesman and the hero stands the Everlasting One, who guards His own and walks with them in the fiery furnace. The centuries which have elapsed are strewn with the names of the pure and the believing, who, in the favor of the Lord, were able to say that whether in this world or the next they were always at home with Him.

Would that those who expend themselves so freely in hand and brain were more vividly aware of God's blessing upon all genuine workers and their work! But do not forget that what men and women most need today is a new vision of God as the Eternal Workman of Christ, as the Comrade of the Worker Who lived among them and died for them. The Divine approval of what is strong and true and ethical, the Divine Wrath blazing against what is treacherous and false and malefic, should be seen and felt as they are not seen and felt by leaders and peoples.

LASTLY the time comes when the thought and purpose of worthy souls center not so much upon personal benefit as upon the work to be done and the assurance of God's approval. We have a set tendency to estimate these questions from their ignoble side. Accusations of greed and selfishness run wild in too many mouths. There is a sickening loss of what we have to do and of the material with which we have to do it, because of wastrels in every social group who betray their trust. But let us at least give others credit for being as honorable and as desirous of pleasing God as ourselves. I meet thousands of my fellows every week, and seldom have I found one less willing to hear the command of the Master of us all than I am myself. Contact with them gives me no Carlylean repulsion, evokes from me no ravings about the insanities of democracy.

From my study window I observe a cluster of roofs covering the homes of those upon whose ceaseless and cheery battle the God of bloodless war casts a sanctioning gaze. Those roofs are found everywhere, and beneath them is celebrated that sacrament of love and service whose altar fires are always leaping heavenward. They have God's benison, here and now! It rests upon them and upon the dwellers whose goings forth and incomings are very dear to Him. But what shall be the worth and glory to follow? That I must leave to the as yet undreamed-of joys which shall be shed by the God-pleasers. A syllable of His commendation outweighs the acclaim of a republic.

One would rather have had a word of earned praise for a literary venture from Dean Howells than a chorus of silly cacklings from the crowd which does not know letters. Immeasurably more than this is God's "well done" for your fidelity in toil. Think of the reversals of human judgment it will incur. Painters whose blood went into the colors, poets, who sang while they starved, soldiers who died alone where was a dearth of woman's tears, inventors who saw the progeny of their genius stolen by the unscrupulous, idealists who were scorned and murdered, and last and best, the dim distant hosts who have had no audible voice, all will hear the ravishing sentence, "Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom." Toil on and in your toil rejoice, proving what is well pleasing to the Lord. The fellowship implied here belongs to common life, to reciprocal knowledge, to mutual service.

There is little intercourse between people who live on separated planes, but, thank God, the workers, and their name is legion, are one, even though there are agitators who deny this. Their oneness is emerging from the chaos; society sees its essentiality, and the drift of public conviction is toward unity. The cohesion means pain and here and there loss; but it will eventuate in solid gains. And if all who compose the new humanity will first offer it and themselves as a sacrifice to God, the race shall not want either direction or power.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Praise God, from whom all Blessings Flow," or "What a Friend We Have in Jesus."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 98. A Hymn of Praise.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 441, first column).

Sermon—"GOD'S WITNESS TO SERVICE."—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"I Need Thee Every Hour" or "The Homeland, O the Homeland," or "Just as I Am."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Grant to us, O Lord, the favor of Thy Presence as we go back to the common daily task. Redeem it from drudgery and hallow it with Thy glory, that we may see in the work of the hand The divine handiwork in our human toil. In Jesus' name, AMEN.

much which these writers elaborate at length. The colossal size of modern industrialism, the continual expansion of society, call for the lubrication of instructive and broadening Christian sentiment. Those who do not want work to become a blind grind, a soulless servitude without a trace of humane consideration, will have to generate a fresh atmosphere in which mutual respect and cordiality prevail.

We can set aside the fools who thrive on adulation and hunger for flattery. But let us have a Christ-like courtesy for the millions of honest and faithful souls in every walk of life who do not receive a tithe of the eulogy they deserve. Service can not be a drudgery when love inspires it, benevolence greets it, and the amenities of Christian intercourse environ it. Religion is chiefly concerned at this point, not alone in its practical expression but also in its inward cultivation. The worshipper must be sure of Divine favor or his pieties are likely to become tortures. The belief that God is and that He is the Rewarder of those who diligently seek Him will have to pervade our ordinances or they will sink to the depths of Hindu fakirism.

BEYOND question, our Heavenly Father never intended us to be in the bondage of fear, as though He were a God of capricious temper and jealous exaction. Quite otherwise, He stoops to share our burden, and has so arranged the faculties of our being that they harmoniously respond to His Will. Think of the quiet pleas of a conscience void of offense; of the regal rest of the mind intent upon realities, of the conscious integrity which is the seal of just endeavor. Is there any bliss quite so tranquil and refreshing as that which flows out of virtuous living?

No man need be of the night who strives for the day. There arises in him the soul's bright morning star. In the darkest shades, if his Creator appear, the

Fervent in Love

SUNDAY. 1 Pet. 4 : 8. "Above all things being fervent in your love among yourselves." Now the apostle is at some pains to make it clear to us what is the quality of this love which should characterize the life that expects the King's appearing. In the first place, it is to be "fervent." Now the significance of our English word "fervor" scarcely unveils to us the contents of the apostle's mind. He did not so much suggest a love that is ardent as a love that is tense. This very word "tense" is almost the original word. The love has to be "tense," stretched out, extended to the utmost limit of a grand comprehensiveness.

The New Testament recognizes different types and qualities of love, and there is no counsel in which it is more abounding than just in this counsel to push back the boundaries of a circumscribed affection, so that it be characterized by a more spacious inclusiveness. There is love whose measure is that of an umbrella. There is love whose inclusiveness is that of a great marquee. And there is love whose comprehension is that of the immeasurable sky. The aim of the New Testament is the conversion of the umbrella into a tent, and the merging of the tent into the glorious canopy of the all-enfolding heavens. Therefore does the writer of this very letter, in a second letter which he has written, give this very suggestive counsel, "add to brotherly love, love." Which just means this: Make your love more tense; push back the walls of family love until they include the neighbor; again push back the walls until they include the stranger; again push back the walls until they comprehend the foe.

The quality of our love is determined by its inclusiveness. At the one extreme there is self-love; at the other extreme there is philanthropy! What is the "tense," the stretch of my love? What is its covering power? I do not wonder that the apostle proceeds to indicate the magnificent "cover" afforded by a magnificent love.

"Love covereth a multitude of sins." Not the sins of the lover, but the sins of the loved! Love is willing to forget as well as to forgive! Love does not keep hinting at past failures and past revolts. Love is willing to hide them in a nameless grave. When a man, whose life has been stained and blackened by "a multitude of sins," turns over a new leaf, love will never hint at the old leaf, but will rather seek to cover it in deep and healing oblivion. Love is so busy unveiling the promises and allurements of the morrow, that she has little time, and still less desire to stir up the choking dust on the blasted and desolate fields of yesterday. "The Son of Man is come to seek that which is lost."

There's a cover for you! I do not wonder that the great evangelical prophet of the Old Testament, in heralding the advent of the Saviour, should proclaim Him as "a hiding-place from the wind, a covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." "Love covereth all things." J. H. J.

Healing the Heart of the World

MONDAY. Prov. 4 : 23. "Keep thy heart with all diligence." We are thinking of Nathaniel Hawthorne's story entitled "Earth's Holocaust." It is the story of men and women who became weary of their foibles and follies and sought to be rid of their fripperies and foolishness. They determined to make an end of them by burning. A great mountain of useless and silly possessions was lighted and the flame and smoke of them rose to the sky. There were in the company a number of reprobates who were sad of countenance now that their business was gone. Satan came up to comfort them: "Be not cast down, my peers," he said, "there is one thing these wisecracks have forgotten." "What is that?" they all shouted. "They have forgotten the human heart. Unless they hit upon some trick of purifying that foul thing, it will soon be the same old world again."

Our business is to change the heart of the world. External remedies will never accomplish the task. We must not think that we have the supreme task completed when we change environments and social status. Change the heart and you change the individual. Only changed hearts can create a changed world. "As a man thinks in his heart, so is he."

The year 1891 marked the first successful surgical operation on the human heart. "The path to the heart is one inch long, but it took surgery twenty-four hundred years to find it," said one of the doctors. In the interim the medical world did some very great things. One fine day it mended a sick heart. The Church has been doing some very fine things here and there. Some fine day it will step forth in the limelight of God's approval and present to him the healed heart of a hitherto very sick world.

Jesus Christ wants our hearts. "Give me thine heart," He pleads. May our answer be

"Take my heart, it is Thine own,
It shall be Thy royal throne."

If we would produce masterpiece lives on the outside, we must first of all produce masterpiece lives on the inside. "Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord." R. B.

What God Wants of Us

TUESDAY. Micah 6 : 8. "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God?" How we shall approach our heavenly Father is a momentous question. How we may obtain joy and peace with Him, beholding His beauty in His temple, should be the supreme question for every one to solve.

Shall we multiply the forms and ceremonies of the ritual? They are but the scaffolding that must fall when the building of character is completed. External observance will not create inward purity. Fasting alone will not produce cleansing. Increasing benevolence cannot bribe justice or atone for the sin of the soul. The sacrifices God requireth are a broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart. What we need is to accept, believe and receive the sacrifice Christ has made, thereby becoming like our Lord in goodness, mercy, justice and in close, careful walking with Him.

Our suffering cannot pay the price of redemption; Jesus paid it all! Self-torture becomes horrible in the presence of Him Who suffered once for all humanity. Personal suffering may sublimate beautiful character, but it must not be self-inflicted. Our part is to walk humbly and harmoniously with Him Who has promised to be with us always. It is then our hearts burn with the joy of His love, as we commune with Him in the way. Happiness and holiness are twin blessings, resulting from fellowship and comradeship with our Lord. Love toward God is best shown by love for our fellowmen. Doing justly and loving mercy, answering the cries of the suffering and needy, the starving, is the way to show our allegiance and obedience to the Father.

Abraham Lincoln must have had our theme in mind when he remarked: "I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true." Theodore Roosevelt regarded Micah's text as the essence of all true religion, the sum of all creeds. E. W. C.

Honoring God

WEDNESDAY. I. Sam. 2 : 30. "Them that honor me I will honor." God puts Himself on our plane when He asks us to honor Him. He makes religion, which seems to some so vague and far off, intimate and near. We know what it means to honor our parents. Of course it means obedience, but it means vastly more. Honor includes respect, reverence, affection. What father would not infinitely prefer to be honored than obeyed? A horsewhip might secure obedience, but obedience is a moral quality. A tyrant is obeyed from fear or force. God is no tyrant; He desires no selfish obedience. This is why He reasons with us: "Come now, let us reason together."

That honor includes obedience is perfectly true, but it includes much more—free obedience, full obedience, cheerful obedience, the obedience of the heart. We honor God by the acceptance of His will as ours. He who prays, "Thy will be done," honors God perfectly. To the deputation that waited upon President Lincoln and assured him they were praying that God might be on the side of the Union, he replied, "I am much more anxious that we should be on God's side." It is certainly far better to seek to ascertain what God's plans are and adjust ourselves to them as life's objective, than to seek to bring God over to our way of seeing things.

It is conceivable that when the adoption of God's will is the rule of our lives we may not be choosing the easy way. Providence does not always move along the line of least resistance. Often it moves along the line of greatest resistance. Then our path ceases to be easy. Then comes the pain of self-denial. But the pain of self-denial is the benevolent pain of discipline. So may we honor God by enduring, by suffering His will. But the end of education, of discipline is character. We learn to do in order to be. The saintly character honors God as nothing else can, since it is a reflection of God.

No one of us has ever done a good or generous deed, has ever put down in himself the selfish and the base, has ever refused to take refuge in a lie, has ever striven to lift the general average of truth and honor by his own choice of the high road, who has not thereby honored God by so doing. C. C. A.

Freedom by Observance

THURSDAY. James 1 : 25. "The perfect law of liberty." An idea prevails in some quarters that liberty and law are mutually incompatible; but in this expression, "the perfect law of liberty," it is suggested that they are quite in accord with each other.

It is a common mistake to assume that liberty means absolutism from all restraint. This was the error of the revolutionists of France who cried, "Down with law and order and government!" and they paid the penalty in confusion worse confounded. "Go as you please" is not the badge of a freeman. Will a disregard of the laws of hygiene set a man free? Nay, it will bind him on a rack and thrust him through with fiery arrows.

Let him apply it in the province of his intellectual life, and where will it land him? To call one's self a "free thinker" because he defies the prescribed rules of thought, is as if a skipper were to ignore the maritime chart, run up the black flag and become a wild rover of the sea.

Nor is it less disastrous to apply this conception of freedom in the province of ethics. He who insists on living as he pleases, despite the moralities, is as far as possible from being free, since he is bondsman to the lusts and passions of his meaner self.

Sin has swept us away from our moorings, so that we are neither where nor what we ought to be. The literal meaning of the word "transgression" is crossing the line. We have lost our freedom in crossing the lines of normal life. Is a fish free when floundering on the shore? Why not? Because it is "out of its element." Man in sin is precisely like a fish out of water. He is out of his element. God intended him to move as easily and joyously on his upward course as a planet in its orbit; and he finds his freedom only in such perfect obedience to perfect law. D. J. B.

Knowing Jesus

FRIDAY. Phil. 3 : 10. "Tha. I may know Him." The growing intimacy with Christ, toward which Paul was ever fondly pressing, was the chief of his life ambitions. You can understand any man's work and purposes much better after you know the man himself. For years we may have been impressed with the zeal and energy of certain preachers, writers and educators who have influenced and stimulated our lives in common with many others. But the great privilege of having even a slight personal contact with some of these men themselves, deepens unspeakably our interest and comprehension of their work. If we would understand the lesson, we must study the teacher. We can not fully understand the Gospel unless we have a growing knowledge of Jesus.

A great many people may have known more about Jesus than you or I, but they may not have known Him as we know Him. They have studied him critically; that is historically or psychologically, yet without having grown to love Him, or to yield full accord to His will. We cannot study him as we study Socrates or Napoleon. These men are dead. Jesus is alive yet; His influence is felt growing ceaselessly throughout the whole world.

What did Jesus say? What did He do? What did He think? What is His real influence on the conduct of the world? You cannot answer these questions through natural science or theology with the same conclusiveness as if you spoke in terms of loving, personal experience. H. P. H.

The Divine Protection

SATURDAY. Psa. 140 : 7. "Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle." How well the writer of these words knew the nature of the conflict and the tactics employed by the foe. While the warrior must look well to the various parts of his equipment, one thing was of vital importance—the covering for the head. For while a spear thrust in arm or leg might disable one for a time, injury to the head was almost sure to mean death. And so, carrying this analogy into the spiritual experience, this warrior of times gone by, looks up to God and gives thanks that He has been to him not only a source of great strength, but arms and armor as well.

There are some things that this statement of the text does not say God will do when we are called to battle against the forces of evil. It does not, for instance, say that He will make us immune from wounds, or from the anxiety of the conflict; but He shall provide a helmet for me, and the Apostle tells us that our helmet is "the HOPE of SALVATION." Can we win out in the battle of life and for life, without this same quality? We can not! But when we have this God-inspired factor upon which to count, we can wield the sword of the Spirit in such a manner as to strike terror into the heart of foes. I. D. L.

Welch's

"THE NATIONAL DRINK"

THIS pure fruit juice is a food-drink as well as a delightfully refreshing beverage. It contains all the richness and vital elements of ripe Concord grapes—for each bottle of Welch's many bunches of selected grapes are required.

Because of its richness, if served "straight," Welch's should be sipped from small glasses. It is a wholesome fruit course for breakfast and a valuable addition to all menus.

For all social gatherings, Welch's is the foundation of many tempting beverages. The Welch Hi-Ball is a favorite at Fountain or Club. Welch's gives most attractive color, body and taste to a punch. Welch's may be blended with ginger ale or lemonade, or be diluted simply with plain or charged water. It should be served cold, always.

Remember that Welch's is a pure fruit juice. Its cost is based on the cost of fruit. Its value is the value of purity and healthfulness.

Order Welch's by the bottle from your grocer, druggist or confectioner. Three sizes, quarts, pints and jugs. Tell the children to ask for the Welch Hi-Ball at the Fountain. Welch's has been the grape juice of known quality since 1869. Say Welch's and get it.

For June Brides—and Other Brides

I WAS shopping with the June bride, yesterday, for the last few things that are always put off until the last few minutes. I went shopping joyously—despite the desperate haste we were in—for the average woman loves to shop! And, as we hurried from counter to counter—pausing at one place to purchase a frying-pan and at another spot to go into raptures over a bit of embroidered linen—I found myself enjoying the brightness of her face as much as I was enjoying the fun of buying pretties—and necessities, for we got dish-pans and kitchen knives and oil-cloth and shelf-paper, as well as the frying pan!

I went shopping, yesterday, with the June bride. And we started out in the morning, as soon as ever the stores were open, and we didn't get through until well past the noon hour. And when we got through, we were so tired that we wandered, very gratefully, into a cool and not too crowded little tea-room. And as we ordered salads and crisp rolls we smiled wearily at each other across the snowy damask of the luncheon-table. And, from the bottom of her heart, the June bride spoke.

"Well," she said, "I must say that I'm glad I'm all through!"

I laughed. "Through!" I said. "Why, child, you're not through! You're just beginning—really, you haven't started yet!"

The June bride laughed with me. And then—

"I reckon you're right," she said thoughtfully. "I reckon you're right! I am just beginning."

"And," I added, "you'll have a long, and sometimes difficult, road to travel, I expect. For no road is ever smooth, all of the time. And you'll meet many amazing adventures and many interesting experiences. Matrimony is full of adventures and experiences. And—"

The June Bride interrupted.

"Don't think," she told me very seriously, "that I have underestimated the great adventure of matrimony. Don't think that I'm going into it with only expectations of sunshiny times, and joy, and success. I know that there will be many hard, dark, difficult moments. I know."

THE salad and the crisp rolls had arrived. But the June Bride did not notice them. Instead, she went on talking:

"Stories," she said, "usually end at the place where the hero and heroine walk solemnly into the little ivy-covered church. Stories usually say—'And so they were married and lived happily ever after!' And uninitiated folk think that marriage is as—as easy as the stories would lead one to believe! They think that the happiness just goes on pleasantly and indefinitely. Well, sometimes it does! But sometimes it doesn't . . ."

"I love the man that I'm going to marry—love him so much that my whole world just seems to revolve around him. I'm the gladdest girl in the world because he cares for me. But I know that there will come times when we'll have to face problems—when, perhaps, we'll disagree. But, even though I realize it, I'm not sorry—not at all. For we'll have each other."

"Life isn't all as easy as it seems to me, now. I've just finished buying a trousseau and furnishing a little home. But I have enough foresight to know that in time the trousseau will wear out, and that the house furnishings will grow shabby. And I don't want my marriage to do that—it must never wear out or grow shabby!"

"I've thought a great deal about marriage—the sober everyday part of it, not the romantic and the sentimental part. And I've come to realize that, to keep it fresh and new and wonderful and worth-while, I must actually work and strive and pray. I can't just sit back and take my happiness for granted, as the story-books suggest. I must make my happiness!"

About the Ideals Upon Which They Are to Build Their Homes

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I wonder how many girls think of marriage as a career? They go in for music or art or teaching or business with a fixed ambition and a splendid set of rules. But do they go into marriage with the same sort of a working basis? Some of them do; but some of them, I am sure, don't!

"The worst way for a bride to start out is with the thought that she's got her husband—and that it's not necessary, any more, to make herself interesting and attractive. The old idea, you know, of not running for a street car after you've caught it! This applies to young husbands, too—only a young husband usually has an easier time, because his outside and business interests keep him mentally, and every other way, on the alert. The wife, who usually must stay at home, day after day, in the same surroundings, finds it harder to keep up."

"A bride—be she a bride of a month or of fifty years—should try just as earnestly to keep her husband as a business girl tries to keep her job. She should be tolerant, neat and charming in her dress, efficient in her home-making and, above all, quick to understand and to sympathize. She must really try to make her marriage a success—not just take the success of it for granted!"

"Very few engaged girls would let their fiancées see them in curl papers. But a good many married women seem to feel that curl papers—even at the breakfast table—are quite all right. Very few engaged girls will quarrel with their sweethearts over trifles—but how many wives soon acquire the habit of nagging? And it's like that, all through, in ever so many little things that are really of vital importance."

"I know that I'll make mistakes, many of them. But it won't be because of carelessness that I'll make them. Marriage is a job that I want to hold for the rest of my life! It's a job that I want to be successful at!"

THE June Bride paused, suddenly conscious of the salad and rolls that were waiting for us.

"My," she said, as she surveyed them, "my, but I'm hungry! And you must be starving. Why didn't you stop me? I've been preaching away about ideals for ever so long, and you must have been bored to death! Why didn't you tell me that I didn't know what I was raving about?"

I surveyed the June bride very thoughtfully, for a moment. And then I spoke.

"I didn't stop you," I said, "because I wasn't bored. I didn't stop you because I'd forgotten that I was hungry. And because—most important of all—I rather imagine that you do know what you've been talking about! I wish that every girl who is about to be married could think as clearly on the subject as you do."

The June Bride laughed, with just a trifle of embarrassment.

"Of course," she said shyly, "I must admit that I'm standing, now, at the entrance to an undiscovered country. Every girl who is ready to take up the responsibility of being a wife and a home-maker is like a traveler entering into new lands. We don't any of us know quite what life may hold for us—or what life may not hold. But—well, knowing that you're going to travel beside someone you care for, knowing that he'll help you over the rough places—and that sometimes you can help him—is more than enough to make up for the uncertainties!"

I nodded, with a world of understanding. And—after a moment—the June bride spoke again.

"Love," she said softly, "is the only thing to base marriage upon. Love should be the foundation of the home. But the walls of the home should be made out of sympathetic understanding. A wife should be ready, always, with advice and praise. She should be tolerant, appreciative, and affectionate. She should be able to play the part of a man's pal, at times, and of his sweetheart at other times. And, upon occasion, she must almost be a mother to him. Marriage is like that!"

The Social Task of the Church

International Sunday-School Lesson for June 26

Rev. 21:1-14

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

DURING the present quarter some of the social teachings of the Bible have been studied. These have been peculiarly worth while in relating the Bible to daily living. All God's Word is to be interpreted in the lives of His children. This review study should bring the twelve previous lessons to mind and their intimate relationships should be very carefully observed. These lessons should have forged a chain of influences for us which will bind each to our Saviour and also to mankind. Turn to the lesson titles and meditate on them, one after the other. Take your Christian Heralds, if you keep them, and read two lesson studies each day through the coming week. Go step by step from "The Ideal Christian" to "Making the World Christian." Becoming a Christian through the new birth changes the entire life of the individual, even as the Christian is to turn the world upside down.

Review Sunday is rich with opportunities. Do not plan merely to restate the chief points and applications of the individual lessons. Very often one thinks of something on the following Monday which would have been a helpful truth to state on the previous Sunday. Review Sunday is your time to say those choice things. The twelve golden texts should be repeated, and from memory if possible. There is an added incentive to learn the golden text each week, if all the texts are to be called for the last Sunday of each quarter. Another simple method for reviewing is to take each lesson and recall Persons, Places, Events, Teachings. Since the recent lessons have been studied topically, there will be special value in looking at the details in the various scripture passages. Remember that you are always studying the Bible though you are teaching the pupil.

The subject, "The Social Task of the Church," is as broad as the world. It covers the interrelations of the individual to the Creator and to Creation. Social Service has been defined as "Dirt, Disease, Drink, Debt, Derelicts." Do not accept, as complete, the definition of any one. By general discussion make your own description of the social task of the church. When a Christian begins to think of opportunity for service and responsibility, one's personal geography is greatly enlarged.

GOV. HUGH M. DORSEY, of Georgia, in a booklet under the title, "The Negro of Georgia," suggests four remedies for the un-Christian social conditions in Georgia that have had wide newspaper publicity in the past months. One of his remedies is: An organized campaign by denominations to place in every section of Georgia a sufficient number of Sunday schools and churches. An even more significant statement was made by Roger W. Babson's Reports. The general subject was Christian Education. In line with the remedy proposed by Governor Dorsey note the supporting reason given by Mr. Babson. He said: "I do insist that the safety of our sons and daughters, as they go on the streets this very night, is due to the influence of the preachers rather than to the influence of the policemen and law-makers. Yes, the safety of our nation, including all groups, depends on Christian education. Furthermore, at no time in our history has it been more greatly needed. The need of the hour is more education based on the plain teachings of Jesus."

Part of the social task of the Church is to create an uplifting public opinion which expresses the consciousness that the most unfortunate person and classes in the world should be so helped that living will be easier and happier. When a sense of ought is recognized much has been accomplished. The non-Christian is generally an egoist, while the Church member is a poor sample of his creed if he is not an active altruist.

Too much social betterment is left to too few in the Church and Sunday school. Every member should have developed ability to do at least one thing that is helpful in Kingdom-building. A certain man, upon declaring that he had been a member of the church for 18 years, was asked what he could do in the work of that church. His reply was a complete negative. Shortly afterwards he was asked to teach a class of boys, which job he attempted. After only a few minutes the boys began to leave the class one by one until only one pupil remained with the teacher, who was sportsman enough to ask that boy to adjourn with him. Then the teacher faced the opportunity and his inability, and studied the work of a teacher and the nature of boys, with the result that he can now answer, when any one asks him what he can do, "I can teach a class of boys," and he is doing it with marked success.

NO SOCIAL task can be too great if all will co-operate. Archimedes' story of one man and a lever long enough is well known. But he never found either the lever or the fulcrum, and he died without moving the world. Today the attention is given to the division of labor in solving world problems. A most striking illustration comes from Camp MacArthur, Waco, Texas. Hut No. 41 had to be removed and re-erected half a mile distant. The plan of the contractor was to tear down and rebuild on the new site. The Colonel of the regiment said that was a waste of time and energy. He stated that the best plan was just to carry the hut to the new location, and agreed to attend to the little matter. The hut was raised from the foundation and part of the floor removed. Stout extension stakes were nailed to the floor joists so that about four feet projected from the outside of the building. Now only 800 men were marched to the building and 600 were detailed to the inside of the hut while 200 were stationed around the outside. Then each man lifted at the same time and just walked off with the structure and set it down, after going by easy stages, on the new foundation. Now meditate on three facts: Each man lifted only fifty pounds, which was an easy load; all lifted and moved at the same time; and the majority of the workers were unseen. One picture of that event shows a crowd standing in front of the building and just talking things over. Nothing happened, however, until each soldier stood in his own place and obeyed the Colonel.

The emphasis in connection with this closing study for the quarter on the "Social Teachings of the Bible" must be, as has been stated in connection with nearly every individual lesson: What are you doing or what will you do in practising these teachings? To have studied these thirteen lessons and not to have projected yourself into more active work in helping others is very calamitous. This is particularly true, because if you are teachers, you are dealing with young people in their character-forming years. If these young people do not acquire the habit of service now it will be most difficult to establish it later. Each one of us must know that we are saved to serve.

Every individual, directly or in relation with his class or school, should be related to some work that is worthwhile. Organized classes are doing great things. Other classes have only a paper rather than a real working organization. Ears are deliberately stopped if no Macedonian call is heard. Few problems can be solved in a day. The perseverance of the saints has an application in maintaining a continuing service. Take firm hold, hold on and win out. Oh, the joy of service and the blessings to those who are helped!

The Car Complete

An Interpretation

SHERIDAN represents the demands of the trade of cars that are better built, better trimmed, more complete in the details of equipment. In appearance, comfort, convenience and mechanical excellence, The SHERIDAN is a notable achievement in motor car values.

Complete Beauty of line, finish and trim; a beauty that makes every detail seem a proper and harmonious part—that makes one proud in its ownership and service.

Complete Comfort, measured by greatly improved riding qualities, scientific body and spring design, highest grade upholstering materials; unusual lounging comfort, roominess, ease of operation and control.

Complete in Conveniences; a combination of unusual refinements; distinctive features of electrical equipment; a practical car, plus important new details that reflect the thoughtfulness with which it was designed.

Mechanically Complete; power smoothly and efficiently applied in a way to insure economy; every part functioning to produce easy, steady progress over the road.

No temptations in the form of lower-priced materials have been permitted to enter against the achievement of quality. The entire equipment and mechanism of The SHERIDAN insure extra years of satisfying service and reflect the perfections that are demanded in a car of unwavering reliability.

The line consists of four and eight cylinder types, each having its open, roadster, coupe, and sedan models.

Where None Is "Chased Away"

THE ragged little boy stood beside the park fountain and stared, ever so wistfully, into the white mist of the water. He was so small and so forlorn and so curiously hopeless looking that I paused beside him, and laid a gentle hand upon his shoulder. I was surprised at the way he flinched away from my hand—surprised at the terrified expression that swept across the thin little face that he raised to mine.

"I didn't mean t' do anythin', lady," he told me plaintively. "I was just a-watchin' th' water!"

"Why, honey," I told him quickly, "I didn't mean to startle you. I don't mind if you stand and watch the water! It's pretty, isn't it?"

The child's eyes searched my face for a moment. It was only when he was positive of my sincerity that he answered—only then that he allowed himself to smile, faintly, at me.

"Yes, lady—it is pretty!" he told me softly, and I saw a sudden light leap into his face. "I like pretty things . . ." He was very quiet for a moment and then he volunteered a remark. "I thought," he said, "that you was goin' t' chase me away. They chase us kids away sometimes when we stan' an' watch pretty things."

MY HAND still rested, lightly, upon the little boy's shoulder. Through the tatters of his shirt I could feel the rigid little bones of him—could feel the lack of softness and warmth that make well-nourished children so cuddly. Poor little chap—he was as forlorn as a stray kitten, as sad and lonely as a little unhappy ghost. Loving beauty with all of his child heart, he was afraid of being "chased away" from the sparkling water spray that was one of the city's few beauty spots. Loving nature, he was denied even a glimpse of it. With eyes suddenly misted I tightened my hold upon him.

"How," I questioned, "would you like some ice-cream—some pink ice-cream?"

Wide-eyed and incredulous, the child looked up at me. For a moment he was speechless, and then—

"I ain't never had pink ice-cream," he told me. "I had white ice-cream—onct—"

We repaired to a drug store. And there, seated upon high stools, we consumed much ice-cream of a high, brilliant rose color. And, between mouthfuls, I heard the little boy's story—in part, at least.

Fragmentarily, as little boys talk, he told me of the poverty of his home, where bread and potatoes were the only food—and a not very plentiful food, at that!

His father—a hard, though not very skillful, worker—was a victim of the unemployment wave that has engulfed our city. His mother did piece-work—at a pitiful wage—for a sweat shop. And there were seven children—all under ten years old—to be clothed and fed. When I heard this I did not wonder that the little boy was so thin and so ragged!

Mont-Lawn Offers Freedom and Happiness to the Children of the City

MONT-LAWN, the Christian Herald Children's summer home on the Hudson, is like a bit of Heaven now. The trees are covered with a mantle of fresh green leaves and the lawns are like soft velvets. The houses—every one of them like a wee home—are being freshly cleaned, and garnished and put into order. Everything seems hushed and radiant and waiting—waiting for the children, who are the heart of Mont-Lawn, to come.

There are more little ones than ever this year who need the country. There are small girls and boys, who are actually dying for want of wholesome food and fresh air, more than we can, perhaps, accommodate. Many families—who could, in former years, struggle alone—are destitute because of the hard times.

But, despite this hard, heart-breaking period, Mont-Lawn has not changed. Despite adverse conditions Mont-Lawn—more beautiful than ever—is swinging wide its welcoming gates to the children of the city slums. Five dollars will still send a child to the country for ten days. Twenty-five dollars will still endow a cot for the season—giving seven children a ten-day vision of happiness. And five hundred dollars will still buy a perpetual endowment, which means that seven children will go to Mont-Lawn every season as long as the home shall last!

IT IS hot, now in New York. And in a few weeks the heat will be unbearable. Emergency wards in hospitals will be filled with dying babies—youngsters who have not the strength to resist the onslaught of the summer. Many children—like the ragged little boy—will creep into parks to see a glimpse of fountain or a stretch of sun-parched grass. And many of them will be sent away—"chased out!"

There is no chasing out at Mont-Lawn. The home, and everything connected with the Home, belongs to the children.

Already the friends of the little ones are hurrying to their aid. Only yesterday a letter came to the Christian Herald from a sailor on one of the nation's battleships. It said:

"I give one-tenth of my income every year to some worthy cause and, for the next twelve months, it shall come to the Children's Home as an allotment; a check for ten dollars every month."

"I love children. That's the reason I'm sending this money to you!"

There are others who say the same thing. "I love children," they say. "And Mont-Lawn is the best way, I know of, to help them!"

Do You Need a New Bible?

PRESIDENT HARDING says: "I have always believed in the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, whereby they have become the expression to men of the word and will of God. I believe that from every point of view the study of the Bible is one of the most worthy to which men may devote themselves, and that in proportion as they know and understand it their lives and actions will be better."

Until July 31st the Christian Herald is going to make it possible for every reader to have a copy of our regular $3.50 edition, red letter Bible, for $2.75, postpaid, or the illustrated $5.00 edition for $3.75, postpaid. These fine Bibles are in full leather binding with overlapping edges. The edges are red under gold. They have 1251 pages, including 16 pages of Holy-land maps in colors. The illustrated edition has 48 full-page photogravure illustrations from the famous Mastroianni sculptural reliefs.

Every home without a good Bible should order one of these editions without delay. Special prices are good only until July 31st.

Free Circulars for Investors.

the Polish and German forces, but failed because of the refusal of the German insurgent leader to permit retreat by his forces.

Meanwhile no date has been set for an Inter-Allied conference to determine the Silesian boundary, and the French desire to postpone a meeting until a commission of experts has reported, a matter which may require two weeks more.

Chancellor Wirth won a vote of confidence from the Reichstag by 213 to 77, the issue being a declaration regarding the fulfillment of the Allied ultimatum. On the Silesian question also his policy was approved.

Scores Perish in Pueblo Floods

FLOOD waters of the Arkansas river, swollen by great cloudbursts, swept through the city of Pueblo, Colo., causing a death list which will run up into the hundreds and doing damage to property estimated at $10,000,000. The destruction in the city was so great that it was impossible to make anything like an accurate check of the flood casualties, but more than a hundred bodies had been recovered and conservative observers believed probably 250 persons had perished. Some estimates ranged as high as 600 dead.

The entire business section of the city was inundated to a depth of from three to eighteen feet by the first rush of water, which came Friday night, June 3. Residents of the lower section had been warned of the danger, but most of them had disregarded the warnings and many were swept away in their homes. To add to the terrors of the situation, explosions of gasoline and oil-tanks spread flames over the flooded area, igniting the wreckage and destroying by fire many structures which might have withstood the flood. All power and lighting plants were wrecked, leaving the city in darkness, bridges were swept away and communication with the outside world was broken for hours, delaying the beginning of relief measures.

On Sunday there were new cloudbursts and huge dams above the city gave way, so that the city again was flooded almost to the level of the previous inundation and the work of caring for the sufferers was greatly impeded. Relief trains from neighboring cities were unable to reach Pueblo, and food was conserved carefully to avert a famine. The city was placed under strict martial law to prevent looting.

Towns in the Arkansas river valley below Pueblo were flooded and several lives were lost. At LaJunta, Colo., the river was three miles wide and it was believed a score of persons had lost their lives. The Platte river overflowed its banks at Denver and that city also feared a disastrous flood.

SEVEN DIE IN AIRPLANE ACCIDENT. Seven persons were killed when a big Curtiss-Eagle ambulance airplane crashed to the ground in a violent wind and electrical storm near Morgantown, Md., forty miles from Washington. The dead were Maurice Connolly, formerly a member of Congress from Iowa; A. G. Batchelder, chairman of the executive board of the American Automobile Association; Lieut. Col. Archie Miller, of the General Staff College; three other army officers and a sergeant of the Air Service. As none survived the crash, the exact cause of the worst accident in the history of American aviation remained in doubt, but several other aviators who were caught by the same storm had narrow escapes from disaster.

AIR BOMB EXPLOSION KILLS FIVE. Another Air Service disaster was the explosion of a fifty-pound TNT bomb which fell from an airplane taking off for a rehearsal bombing flight from the Government Proving Grounds at Aberdeen, Md. Five men were killed and eleven others were injured, two of them probably fatally, all except one of the victims being in the army.

PREMIERS OF BRITISH DOMINIONS TO MEET. The premiers of the British dominions and representatives of India are to hold in Premier Lloyd George's official residence in London this month a conference at which many important questions of the Empire's policy will be discussed, among them the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese treaty and the sharing by the Dominions of the burden of naval defense. Such a development is of great moment, marking the extension to the Dominions of a greater share in the determination of Britain's policies.

SCOTT C. BONE TO BE GOVERNOR OF ALASKA. President Harding has nominated Scott C. Bone, who was publicity manager for the Republican National Committee in the last campaign, to be Governor of Alaska. Mr. Bone formerly was editor-in-chief of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

GENERAL HORACE PORTER DIES. General Horace Porter, ambassador to France during the McKinley administration and the last survivor of General Grant's military staff, died at his home in New York City at the age of 84.

ANTI-BEER BILL REPORTED FAVORABLY. The House Judiciary Committee has filed a favorable report on the bill prohibiting the use of beer as medicine and restricting to one pint the quantity of wine which may be obtained on a single prescription. The committee added a provision that a physician may issue not more than 100 liquor prescriptions within ninety days.

SYRACUSE CHANCELLOR TO RESIGN. Rev. Dr. James Roscoe Day, who has been Chancellor of Syracuse University for twenty-seven years, has announced his resignation, to be effective as soon as a successor can be appointed. Dr. Day, who is seventy-five, wishes to devote his time to study and writing.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, hereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE Great Commission Prayer League, Chicago, is earnestly inviting spiritual co-operation in exploring divine blessing on the Bill Board Gospel Campaign that is now being planned throughout the country, and that it may be made the means of bringing many to realize the need of a Saviour. This is a matter which should be taken up by our Prayer League at the earliest opportunity, and by individual members and little groups of members of the League all through this land.

Mrs. A. E. W. writes: "Pray for the Tabernacle Church at Wilson, N. C., that we may have a revival of religion and that many may be saved and the church greatly strengthened."

E. W. B. writes: "We are in need of a mighty awakening by the power of God here in Richland, Okla. Pray that we may have a demonstration of His power in the meetings we are about to commence."

"All members of the Prayer League are requested to unite in prayer for a world-wide wave of personal evangelism," writes D. M. R., of Canada. "And I would also ask prayer that the Lord will open the hearts of people all over the world to attend to the Word of Life."

Mrs. J. B. asks prayers for the town of Quapaw, Okla. and for the little church and Sunday School which has now only a few members.

M. A. C. W. asks prayers for father, sister, brother and herself, that they all may be restored to health; also that the officials of the church at New London, Conn., may be filled with the Holy Spirit, and that the church may have a revival and many souls be saved.

R. C. asks prayers for a revival at Catawba, S. C., and M. E. R. writes: "I wish to ask prayers for the heart searching and revival of the members of the churches of Pasadena, Calif., and of David City, Nebr."

A. B. Hollenbeck writes: "Will your faithful Prayer League admit me into your Prayer circle and pray to our Heavenly Father that I may receive power from on high, and may be a blessing in God's hands in E. Las Vegas, New Mexico, for the saving of precious souls. We are planning for a revival."

I. E. McL., Puslinch, Ont., asks prayers for the Sunday School in S. S. No. 9, that it may be built up; J. E. T., for the church at Milton Mills, N. H., and Mrs. G. for the church and people at East Pittstown, N. Y., and Mrs. A. W. B. requests the members to pray for a church in Pasadena, Calif., "that it may come back to the old, old Gospel of our Lord and Saviour."

Among the general requests are the following: for healing, 200; conversion of relatives and friends, 176; blessing, 29; peace, 17; faith, 36; reconciliation, 10; spiritual advancement, 31; financial aid, 40; guidance, 31; recovery from the drug habit, 1; heart's desire, 22; success, 19; and reunions, 4.

We have also received acknowledgments of answered prayers from Mrs. S. F. Y., E. M., M. S., S. S., Mrs. L. F. E., Mrs. G. A. D., Mrs. B. C., Mrs. G. H. W., Mrs. W. F. H., J. D. P., Miss E. J. W., J. W. K., Mother, Mrs. T. Y., Mrs. H. J. T.

"We are having such wonderful answers to prayer in Syracuse," writes Mr. John Goebel, "that I want the Christian Herald family to know of it. An evangelistic campaign is on, and the outstanding feature about this campaign is the large number of sick and suffering ones that come and a great many of them are healed. It seems like Bible times!"

toward consolidated schools, made possible largely by better roads and hence better means of transportation. In some countries where modern road systems have been completed, the one-room school has been literally banished and in its stead four or eight-room or even larger school buildings, up-to-date in every way except from the standpoint of fire-safety, have taken their place. As a result purely educational facilities have been wonderfully improved, while the safeguarding of children from fire has been in many cases neglected. Fifty-eight per cent of the schools in the country, though not classed as fire-traps, could easily be destroyed by fire.

DO NOT these facts point irrefutably to a line of activity which should commend itself to the immediate consideration and action not only of the Mothers' and Parent-Teachers' Associations, but to every parent who has a child of school age? Immediate legislation which is forceful, pointed, and not susceptible to misinterpretation is the most effective means of curing this calamitous national situation. A simple law requiring that all school buildings more than one story high shall be of the highest type of fire resistive construction would eliminate the possibility of another such catastrophe as that at Collinwood, Ohio, and at many other places too well known to those where loss has caused lasting grief to many a household.

It requires no stretch of the imagination to realize that the loss of innocent child life in a firetrap school is one of the most deplorable events that could happen or be in prospect. Fire-escapes are all very well in their place, but they cannot make a burnable building fire-safe. The only way is to build it so that there will be no food for flames—so that a fire which starts can at most be but a small one and can be confined without effort to the place of origin. Millions of words have been printed about our national fire loss. Reduced to dollars and cents this has been ranging around a million dollars a day for some time. We celebrate an annual Fire Prevention Day with a great deal of gusto, parades, music, object lessons, speeches—everything but hard and fast legislation that would forever correct existing evils. The fire loss in dollars and cents is a trifle compared with the fire loss in lives, however few, since no adequate value can be placed upon them.

VIEWING the fire loss solely from the monetary standpoint, isn't it time that such needless waste were stopped, when any architect or builder can tell you that he knows how to build fire-safe? Everybody admits that fire loss is a deplorable waste. Even when the loss is "covered by insurance," the fact remains that the money returned to the person who suffered the loss does not compensate for other losses which are non-insurable, and above all it is not compensation for the utter destruction of natural resources which were drawn upon when the structure was built.

Schools present a far greater hazard these days from the underwriters' standpoint than they used to. The more modern the building, the more likely it is to have all those appointments which invite its use as a community center. Domestic science, manual training and shop practices as a part of educational courses are now a feature of most of the more comprehensive schools, and these are representative of the additional hazards introduced into school buildings.

In most cases little precaution is taken when the building plans are being worked out to safeguard against these hazards. An era of building is no doubt about to dawn. When it does, let us not try to defend ourselves with the statement that it was necessary to rush into this building without properly laid plans, for that defense can no longer apply.

Don't let your children miss them

Mix Puffed Rice with your berries. These flimsy, flavory morsels add what crust adds to a shortcake. Any fruit dish is made doubly delicious when you blend them in.

Garnish ice cream with Puffed Rice. The grains are like airy nut-meats. Use them in candy making. Scatter either Puffed Grain in your soups.

Douse with melted butter for hungry children in the afternoons.

Puffed Grains are not mere breakfast dainties. They are food confections—airy, flavory, toasted tidbits, to be used in many ways.

But with all they are whole-grain foods, with every granule fitted to digest. Every food cell is exploded. Every atom feeds.

These are the best-cooked cereals in existence. They are the best-liked cereals, too. In summer, serve them morning, noon and night. No other method supplies whole-grain foods in such hygienic form.

Invented by Prof. Anderson, the food expert. Made by causing 100 million steam explosions inside every kernel.

Men and Women Whose Lives Should Inspire Us

E. L. and C. E. Heb. 11 : 32-40; 12 : 1-2
See the denominational Missionary Annals

THERE are no lessons so inspiring as those derived from Christian biography. To read the chronicles of the Greathearts and Stronghearts of history, both religious and secular, whom to know is to feel ourselves exalted, is to realize even in this twentieth century of distracting materialistic age in many instances, that the age of chivalry is not dead but very much alive as vitalized by the heroisms and sacrifices of the hour. King Arthur's Round Table is not a bit of idealistic literature confined only to the printed page, but a chronicle that may represent any period of the world's history. The "Vision of Sir Launfal" has not faded off the horizon but is vivid and fresh today as ever.

Mission fields, home and foreign, city slums and isolated frontiers are daily contributing their share of noble living and splendid endeavor for the making of a better world, not to mention scores of private nobilities of effort that will never be given space under the caption "In the Public Eye." College halls and seminary corridors pour out young men and women bound for battle royal and loyal fidelity by the submerging of self and the nullification of the ego in behalf of others. There are still those who "are unwilling to slide into cautious graves but who would rather forget themselves into immortality."

"How poor were earth if all its martyrdoms
If all its struggling signs of sacrifice
Were swept away and all were satiate smooth."

Life Sketches of Great Adventurers

B. Y. P. U. See above topic.

WE IGNORE the fellowship and despise the sentiment of those who depreciate the race to which they belong and whose tribute is a sneer. He surely has a starved soul and meager mind who says "However we may brave it out we men are a little breed." The noble person is one who fixes the mind on the best in his brother and friend and the same spirit possesses him who is a true friend and brother of the race.

So we glory in the procession of our pioneers and prophets, the regenerators and helpers, the architects of our liberties and the roadmakers of civilization, the founders of our institutions and the framers of our ideals, the avengers of our wrongs and the champions of our rights, the apostles of our religion and the missionaries of its passionate propaganda. Men and women have felt that whatever God has lent them of wealth and health, brain and brawn, passion for others and power for doing, was lent them in trust for humanity. Men and women,

"Whom we build our love around like an arch
Of triumph as they pass us on their way
To glory and immortality."

He alone is great in heart who gladdens the world with a great affection, great in mind who stirs the world with noble thoughts, great of will who shapes to a higher destiny, truly Christian who lives and loves and toils like his redeeming Lord. And he is adored by his fellows and adorned of God who does most of these things and does them best. Sacred friendship with its unselfish toil ready to die for those it loves; holy philanthropy that pours out its treasure to enrich environment; noble patriotism that is slain in its high places, beautiful in death. These are beautiful thoughts that challenge our attention. Let us think on these things and, thinking, strive to do likewise.

Mrs. Ida G. N., Mocksville, N. C., writes: "We erected the Family Altar in our home more than thirty years ago. I have been a lonely widow twenty-five years; still my ninety-two-year-old mother and I keep the fires burning. I have sent five children out into the world, and not a blemish on their names."

A. Halling, Lebanon, Ill., writes: "Our Family Altar began when the children were small. For a number of years we have used the Daily Meditations published in the Christian Herald. Previously we used exclusively the Bible, from the Psalms, Proverbs, the Prophets and the New Testament. The latter I have re-read a number of times, especially the Gospels. Our best time for devotions is at supper time, because the whole family can be there. I think a Family Altar could be made possible in every home, and I find it a source of strength. We also, wife and I, have prayer in the morning. The Christian Herald is a help to us all."

Mrs. L. V. P., Berkshire, N. Y., writes: "When I first began to think of having a home with my husband I told him that whatever we did to make a happy home we must have a Family Altar. This plan has been carried out with more or less success during all our eleven years of married life. Now we have four children and many hard and pressing duties, as we live on a dairy farm. But we try never to neglect the good Book before we sleep. I usually read some chapter of the Bible, or part of a chapter, on the Sunday School lesson. Often I stop and ask the children a question, to see if they hear and understand. If not, I read the passage over and explain the meaning. Then my husband and I take turns in prayer. The Lord's Prayer follows and closes our devotion and the two older children join. Sometimes they say a prayer of their own. As they grow older I mean to have them lead in prayer more often. I think a Family Altar is possible and necessary in every home, if the members are anxious to walk in the heavenly way and get all the help they can to keep in that way. All kinds of excuses are given for neglecting Family Worship, lack of time being the main one. But my mother taught me to believe that 'prayer and provender hinder no man's journey'. Jesus said 'Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you.' That is one way of seeking first the Kingdom, getting close to God at the Family Altar. A great evangelist said he had an unconverted brother who told him with tears running down his cheeks that he never could get away from the holy influence of the Family Altar of his childhood."

Mrs. C. A. J., Los Angeles, Calif., writes: "My Family Altar was only a few months old and I found it hard to keep up the interest. I asked you what I might do, but you did not suggest much, yet you encouraged me to go on. Now, I can see why one can hardly suggest a method or form which will be always interesting. The interest lies within one's self. We must never give in to our frame of mind, when Satan seeks to discourage, but as Fosdick says in his book, 'The Meaning of Prayer,' when we feel the least like praying, we should pray the more. My oldest boy was in his teens when I set up the Family Altar, and if I had not failed in my first attempt to do so many years before, I am sure it would have made a stronger impression on him. We took turns in reading until the oldest boy could read, and only used the stories which they could understand. The best and most interesting method I have ever had is to study the Sunday School lesson. In our Sunday school credits are given and so many place them on the Honor Roll. One thing is required, to read the Bible every day, using the parts suggested in the Quarterly. Thus the Family Altar is a place to help them succeed, and I am comforted that God says His word shall never return unto Him void. I am sure the Family Altar is possible in every family. They should have some time to be together if not all at once, perhaps in part. When my oldest boy went to work and arose earlier than the younger, I had two seasons of prayer in the morning. God will always plan a way if we are willing. After all these years—and I am now helping to earn the living besides keeping house—I am glad to say our Family Worship continues and I have come out triumphant, though Satan set up many hindrances. Nothing can take its place in any Christian home. My prayer is that we may have more Family Altars and we will have better citizens."

N. W. M., Los Angeles, Calif., writes: "We have had Family Altar ever since I was first married in 1863. We conduct it every night just before retiring. It is necessary with those who remain at home."

C. A., Whiting, Nebr., writes: "I am a lone widow. I ask God to bless every meal I eat. When I go to rest I ask the Lord to protect me. He is the Ark of Safety. I ask Him to help me so to live that I may not cause anyone to fall. I ask you to pray for us. We have fine people here. I have taken the Christian Herald for about thirty years."

Mrs. B. M. D., Diggs, Va., writes: "We have family prayer just before the morning meal. My husband reads a chapter from the Bible, then prays, ending with the Lord's Prayer."

M. O. Dick, Lamar, Colo., writes: "In my home, the Family Altar has been there as long as I can remember, and before I was married—more than thirty years ago—it was understood the Family Altar would be maintained. After breakfast we read a portion of Scripture, kneel and have our prayers. Last thing before retiring the same is repeated and a blessing asked at each meal."

2. Bible Promises Relating to Troubles in Life.
3. Bible Promises of Spiritual Blessings in This Life.
4. Bible Promises of Blessings in the Future World.

and many other chapters containing hundreds of inspirational verses from the Bible.

"The materials which are collected here are all divine, and the disposition of them is elegant and regular; so that it is an easy matter to find something suited to the frame of our souls, or our present wants on every occasion; and that soul who knows what a suitable promise is worth in an hour of darkness or temptation, will never think such a work as this, and such a various treasure, can have sufficient value set upon it.

Those who have little leisure for reading may find their account in keeping this book always near them; and with the glance of an eye they may take in the riches of grace and glory, and derive many a sweet refreshment from hence, amidst their labors and travels through this wilderness. It is of excellent use to lie on the table in a chamber of sickness, and now and then to take a sip of the river of life, which runs through it in a thousand little rills of peace and joy.—Dr. Watts.

Are You Talking to the Right Man About Motion Pictures?

YOU people who care more about better motion pictures than any other section of the community, must act.

There is one man in your midst who desires nothing better than to be guided by your wishes.

If your ideals of quality in photoplays are as high as Paramount's he wants to know about it, and he wants to show you and your friends all the Paramount Pictures he can get.

It's no good simply talking among yourselves when your indignation is aroused by some inferior picture.

Talk to the man who can change it, the exhibitor,
the manager of your theatre.

His creed is the survival of the fittest pictures, and that means Paramount.

Work with us who are working with you: work with Paramount by selecting the occasions for attendance when Paramount Pictures are being exhibited.

You will soon realize that Paramount Pictures are better entertainment as well as better in a deeper sense, in all the values that you cherish.

The Way Out

The Religious Sentiment of All Races, Expressed Through the Churches, Offers a Means of Limiting Armaments

GENERAL TASKER H. BLISS

During the terrible fighting of 1917, General Bliss said not long ago in arguing for the convening of a full and free international conference to devise means for the limitation of armaments, a question which often came up in the talks of Allied officers was: "How long can the world stand this sort of thing?" "Everything that I heard," he added, "confirmed my opinion that the general sentiment was ripe for a settlement of the matter. I would still believe it practicable if everybody else said no"

IS THERE a way out of the present international impasse? I believe there is, and it is through the door of religion.

That was a remarkable letter which Gen. Tasker H. Bliss sent to the churches through the Church Peace Union, in which he said:

"If the churches cannot agree upon a demand for an international conference, for limitation of armaments, it will not be achieved; nor will it be achieved until the good God puts into them the proper spirit of their religion. The responsibility is entirely upon the professing Christians of the United States. If another war like the last one should come, they will be responsible for every drop of blood that will be shed, and for every dollar wastefully expended."

This letter, sent far and wide through the press, and immediately made the text of a great interdenominational gathering, and of innumerable sermons and addresses in the churches, may well be the spark that will light the flame of consecrated enthusiasm to end all wars; the bugle call that will arouse the churches, and all men of good will, to their opportunity and their duty.

No one else could have sounded this note so effectively as an eminent military man. The same thing has been said in substance, if not so trenchantly, by a multitude of the ethically minded, but it has often been discounted because the speaker or writer was a preacher or teacher. "It's his business to preach to us," is the natural retort; "what does he know of military necessity?" and thus the edge of these exhortations has been dulled.

But here is a man, who, when he speaks of war,

By

knows what he is talking about. He knows the awful carnage of the battlefield; he realizes the frightful waste of the world's resources which war involves; he understands the terrific burdens of taxation and consequent poverty which a great military establishment is piling up, for our own backs and for the backs of our children's children. He realizes that another world war may be so much more terrible than the last as to set back the clock of civilization for a millennium. He knows all that can be said in favor of war, and yet he writes as he does.

Because he realizes these issues as no non-military man can do, he makes this appeal to the churches, appealing to them against his own profession, as it were, and risking the enmity of his own comrades in arms, so many of whom seem to believe that to make war is their only mission, instead of the safeguarding of peace and justice.

His is "a word fitly spoken," which, the Wise Man tells us, is "like apples of gold in pictures of silver"; or, as it has been translated, "like a golden picture in a frame of silver."

BUT whether General Bliss had uttered this challenge or not, it was bound to be spoken, for every tendency of the church for years has led up to it. At no other time could such a challenge come to the Christian world with such effect as now.

While the war lasted, it would have been scouted as the word of a pussyfoot Pacifist. What, then, was more devilish than a Pacifist! Its author might have been court-martialed for it. Indeed, some of General Bliss's extreme militarist colleagues would doubtless like to court-martial him now. We are told on high authority that this "church move" causes much "anxiety" in high military circles, especially since important secular papers have declared, through a widely syndicated correspondence, that:

"Such exalted conviction as that, coming from a man of General Bliss's standing and character, and addressed to an officially existing group, which includes the Protestant churches, the Catholic churches, and the Jewish churches of America, might turn out to be the beginning of a spiritual movement far more effective toward ending the world's troubles than all the wandering in blind alleys that the politicians and economists have been doing."

Now is the psychological moment (pardon the shiny threadbareness of the word) for the utterance and the repetition and re-repetition of this dictum of General Bliss's. A thousand men of like character, and a thousand publications, should utter the same appeal.

Until recently we have never seen how hopeless are the "blind alleys" that lead in other directions. Before the war some of us sought comfort from the dread of another great conflict through a fatuous belief in the tortuous mazes of self-interest.

The labor unions, we said to ourselves, are so powerful that they would not permit their governments to initiate a war, since laboring men would be the chief sufferers. Then we said: "Big business will prevent a world war, for it would mean ruin to many. The governments of Europe owe so much to the Jews of Frankfurt and Amsterdam that they cannot afford to risk their displeasure."

Again we said, "The socialist parties are so strong in the old world that no cabinet would dare to run counter to their oft-declared principles of pacifism."

Some of us got lost in the still blacker alley of excessive military preparedness. The hoary lines, "In time of peace prepare for war"; and "The best insurance against war is to be ready for it," led captive our reason. Even now these lies sometimes lift their diminished and discredited heads and whisper, "In order to prevent the next war we must spend another half billion on armaments."

ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS

Speaking of Europe's desire for disarmament and of his meetings with European statesmen in war days Admiral Sims said: "One of the commonest remarks made was that when we should get done with this war we would all be pretty faulty if we could not find some means by which we could get along peaceably in the world and safely without the enormous expenditures of a country like France, which needed a great army to protect itself from invasion from the east, and countries like Great Britain, needing protection on the sea"

Last of all we saw light and the prospect of permanent peace in the League of Nations. We clung as desperately to it as a shipwrecked sailor to a life-boat, but we are beginning to feel that our life-boat is battered and leaking, since the League's officials dare not tackle, man fashion, the fundamental question of international disarmament, or even the limitation of armaments.

Nevertheless we are loath to give it up, and hope it may yet be patched up so as to ride the turbulent waves of national selfishness, jealousy and distrust.

THE attitude of many nations is that of small boys with fists doubled up, fire in their eyes, wrath in their hearts. We have all seen them thus face each other. They spar, and dance around for position. Each one knows that he is in danger of being whipped, and would be glad to drop his belligerent attitude and go home, but, in the language of the small-boy audience, gathered to see the "scrap," "one's afraid and the other dassent," either fight or give it up and go home peacefully. Now comes the opportunity for a full-grown by-stander to say, "Stop this foolishness, boys; shake hands and forget your quarrel."

The By-stander in this world's prize ring is the Religious-Sentiment-of-All-Races, embodied in the churches, synagogues and temples of the world.

This sentiment has never been effectively appealed to, perhaps it could not have been aroused before however many the peace sermons that have been preached.

I believe that the keynote has been struck by General Bliss. It will vibrate through every religious assembly during the coming year. Within the next twelve months almost every religious denomination in all lands will hold a representative assembly. Literally tens of millions of people moved by a common religious motive will assemble in gorgeous temples or in plain meeting-houses to discuss this theme. They will represent hundreds of millions who must stay at home, but who will join them in spirit, and will be mightily influenced by their deliverances.

This great question of disarmament and consequent peace, or effective limitation of armaments will not down. It must be faced to satisfy the aroused and indignant constituents of these assemblies, who have had forced upon them for months the startling knowledge that over ninety per cent of our national revenues is used to pay for past or prospective wars, and that their own money is being squandered on short-lived battleships of very doubtful value even when new. Our own people and other peoples understand such facts as never before, and this bitter realization of what war really means will be added to the supreme religious motive for exorcising the Demon who revels in extravagance, deceit, lust and murder, and who, when let loose, breaks the bones of every commandment in the Decalogue.

THE power of religious sentiment when aroused is not often realized. It is as strong today, if not so easily expressed, as when a Pope ruled the civilized world. It once put a stop to the gladiatorial shows. It abolished the duello. It has outlawed the lottery in America. It has made the prize ring disgraceful. It wrote the Eighteenth Amendment into the Constitution.

Whatever opponents may think of the wisdom of any of these measures there is no question as to the chief driving force which made them possible.

Why may we not believe that this same David with his sling and his stone, the pulpit and the press, will hit the bragging Goliath, War, a death blow?

Let it not be said that the churches are so divided that they cannot act together on any great moral issue. The two hundred and fifty-seven varieties of religious belief, creed, and practice, as represented by the Protestant denominations in America, have far more in common than appears upon the surface.

With few exceptions their fundamental religious beliefs are the same. On the great moral issues of the day they can act as one.

There are many instances where Protestants and Catholics join in promoting the temperance and purity of a community. I recently attended a legislative hearing for the abatement of a movie nuisance, where, though the protestants were largely Protestants, an honored Catholic priest made the effective speech that carried the day for the united churches. On the Board of Trustees of the Church Peace Union are leading Jews, Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Few Americans realize the added strength that will come from the sympathy and active co-operation of the so-called Greek Church, more properly the Oriental Orthodox Church.

The beloved Serbian Bishop, Nicolai Velmerovitch, has recently been in our country and has been received with distinguished honor. Every one has been impressed by his Christlike face, simple dignity and natural, spiritual bearing. He is a friend of leading Protestant pastors of different denominations in Great Britain and America, and often preaches in their pulpits.

When calling upon him in his palace in Belgrade a few months ago, I was particularly impressed with his yearning for universal Christian brotherhood. He said to me: "Why should we draw apart from each other? Our fundamental beliefs are the same. It has been in the unessential matters of forms and ceremonies that we have differed. We in our Oriental Church may drink the Water of Life out of a golden chalice, and your Protestant denominations may think it right to use only a plain earthen cup, but what does that matter? The Water of Life is the same in either."

THERE, too, is the great Russian section of this "far-flung battle line" of the churches, only waiting for the destruction, or waning power, of Bolshevism to co-operate with the rest of Christianity on moral and religious issues. In the old days of Czarism this was impossible, as it still is, in these days of the Soviet.

Most unprejudiced visitors to Russia agree that the Bolsheviks' days are numbered, though no one dares to predict their number. It is well known, however, that Lenin's government was not able to throttle the religious life of the Russian Church, though it did its best. In the early days of this government the Soviet authorities issued all sorts of impotent decrees against the Church, and even placarded the walls of the cathedrals with such mottoes as "Religion is the opiate of tyrants." But the simple peasants knew better, and were not swerved from their faith. Indeed, their religious zeal has been greatly quickened; the priests, released from the shackles and muzzles of the State Church, have marvelously increased their devotion and influence, and the Soviet leaders were obliged to put the soft pedal on efforts to destroy the Church.

We can well believe that when these tens of millions of the Russian Church have a chance to speak their minds, and exert an influence on world politics, they, too, will do their part, in helping to abolish the Devil who has striven so hard to ruin their land.

The existence of even closer ties, that bind together the Protestant denominations in Europe and America, when they unite on a great moral issue, must not be ignored. Lutherans in America are united in peculiar bonds to the Lutherans of Germany, Scandinavia, and Eastern Europe. Presbyterians in the United States, and Hungary, and other lands, look to Mother Scotland with affection. The Congregationalists, and Baptists of New England and the West look to Old England as, religiously, their Motherland, while the Methodists have peculiar ties binding them to the Wesleysans of Great Britain and Australia.

THE sentiment of religious solidarity has been greatly strengthened during and since the war; by the international exchange of pulpits on the part of Protestant ministers; by the ministrations of chaplains, both Protestant and Catholic, to the boys in the trenches; by the activities of the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, and the Salvation Army; by the intercommunion of Sunday schools and Young People's Societies. In one of these societies four millions of members, speaking nearly a hundred different languages, have taken the same pledge, and frequently meet together both internationally and interdenominationally.

The Federal Council of Churches, by the many visits of its officers to Europe and the formation of sympathetic organizations there, has been effective in developing a solidarity of Protestant Church effort which the world has never known before.

The Church Peace Union, before alluded to, with its leaders in all denominations, Protestant, Catholic and Jewish, an organization from which Andrew Carnegie, its founder, rightly hoped so much, is exerting a wide and sane influence at home and abroad; while its child, The World Alliance for the Promotion of International Friendship through the Churches, with its "Councils" or branches, in many lands, is a new power which makes only for fellowship and good-will.

These influences for promoting world-peace, which, of course, if permanent, must mean ultimate disarmament, are working, quietly and unostentatiously but powerfully, and are, I believe, pointing the way out from the house of black horror in which we have lived for the past seven years, into God's sunshine.

These organizations have accepted, or will accept, the challenge of Gen. Bliss, and will remember that they and those whom they represent will be held responsible for another possible world war, if they do not do their utmost for the immediate limitation and ultimate abolishment of world armaments.

They will not only do this, but, when the preliminary conference is held, they will not allow wily politicians, and militarists, open or disguised, as in the past, to hoodwink them with fair words or unfulfilled promises. They will not allow them to cry, "Peace, peace, when there is no peace," and when they, the militarists, do not desire peace. The conscience of the church has been awakened. It will not sleep again.

Bringing the Presidency Nearer the People

WHILE the cautious conservatism of the founders of our government was justified and wise, we have long since outgrown any idea that the people cannot be trusted. We have learned by experience that a government of and by the people, is the best government for the people, and that the keystone of the arch of our governmental strength is the good sense and sound judgment of the whole people of the United States.

This being so, I am advocating at this Congressional session a bill giving to the people of the several States, the direct right to nominate such candidates for President and Vice-President as they want, independent of any political manipulation and control. In this bill also is included provision for the regulation and control of the political machinery of the parties, especially as such regulation and control applies to the contribution and expenditure of money for political purposes.

Because there may be some doubt as to the technical constitutionality of such a bill under the Constitution as it now exists, I am introducing an amendment to the Constitution providing for nation-wide primaries to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President as well as extending to Congress the legislative power of regulating and controlling, in the people's interest, the contributions and expenditures and internal machinery of the political parties.

It is my firm belief that all necessary political expenditures should be appropriated by congress, and thereby cut off the unfair advantage that rich men now seek by making large contributions to campaign funds.

My amendment in all probability will require as much campaigning as the recent eighteenth and nineteenth amendments have required but it is bound to be the keynote to the political activities of all parties within the next year, and it reads as follows:

"1. The electors of the President and Vice-President shall be the people of the States of the United States, and shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures; and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be the Vice-President.

"2. The Congress shall have legislative power to regulate and control elections for President, Vice-President, Senators and Representatives in Congress; to provide for, regulate and control the selection and nomination of persons to be voted for at such elections and the appointment of officers to supervise or execute any law adopted under this power; and to appropriate funds for carrying out the foregoing powers."

AS MATTERS now stand, there is no way in which political chicanery and corruption can be prevented or punished. It is a well-known fact that three of the delegates who sat in a recent convention of one of the great political parties, had large sums of money in their pockets furnished by or in behalf of one of the candidates before that convention. These men sat and voted for the man whose money they had taken, yet they had broken no law, because there is at present no way of enacting a constitutional law that will cover this class of despicable actions.

Theoretically, at the present time, the people elect the electors who choose the President; but practically, a few men who have gained control of the political machinery of the parties, compel the people to vote for one or the other of the two men whom they have selected, and there is no law and no constitutional provision by which this can be prevented.

My bill and amendment are meant to change this condition and provide for the nominations and elections by the action of the people themselves and to provide also severe punishments for an attempt to prostitute the will of the people as expressed by law and I would fix a penalty of twenty years imprisonment on offenders who violate party pledges and platforms.

The framework of the bill will harmonize with the State laws and give uniform opportunities. An officer should be elected from each Congressional district whom we can term a member of the State Committee, and a member-at-large who shall be Chairman of the State Committee and this member-at-large shall also be a member of what we term the National Committee which will be composed of one member from each State and Territory and will elect its chairman.

These men should be given a stated salary. There should be a committee of not less than five men, whose headquarters should be in Washington and who should be selected by Congress. Not more than three of this commission in any instance are to be of any one party and any party which can poll twenty per cent. of the vote shall be entitled by law to have a membership which may be increased as conditions require.

This Commission will necessarily have to be clothed with considerable power and should be placed in Washington where all contests and disputes may be decided.

This machinery will give a body of men elected by the people who can meet in convention and shape party principles and set out party platforms.

IN 1787, when the United States Constitution was adopted by the convention of States which Congress had called for the purpose of preparing it and submitting it to the States for ratification, popular government was an untried experiment.

So the framers of our Constitution, which is the foundation on which our whole federal government is built, provided for three classes of representation. The members of the House of Representatives were to be elected by the people directly and were intended to be, as they actually are, the people's direct and intimate representatives in the federal legislature; the Senators were to be elected two from each State by the legislatures of the States and were intended to represent the interests of their States as distinguished from the individual interests of the people.

In 1913, we amended this provision of the Constitution so that Senators are now elected by the direct vote of the people. The President, the most powerful official in the world and the man now looked to for guidance by 100,000,000 people, was to be chosen by a body of electors who could, and can today, be selected in any way that any state legislature may direct and there is nothing in any law that prevents these electors from voting for any man they please, so long as he is a natural born citizen of the United States, thirty-five years old.

A Story of the Coast Guard

By MAUDE BURBANK HARDING
Illustrated by William C. McNulty

THE lobby of the Congress Hall Hotel was deserted except for three men, who were dimly visible through a wavy curtain of cigar smoke.

One of them drew out his watch. "Five minutes yet," he announced. "Brightman is never ahead of time, but he was never known to be late."

"Was he ever known to change his mind?" The questioner leaned forward, a boyish yearning shining in his aging eyes.

The third man put a kindly hand upon his friend's shoulder.

"Bly, old chap," he said, "we've prepared you for his answer, haven't we? Brightman is not interested in your bill for the life-savers. Their future means nothing to him, and he doesn't spend his energy on mere favors to his fellow-Congressmen."

The compact bulk of the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee loomed before them, and the prestige of his position was clearly established by the fact that the three men instinctively rose.

Jameson Brightman set down his Russian leather traveling bag, but remained standing.

"Well, gentlemen?" It was a challenge.

Congressman Bly took one step forward. "Before you go, Mr. Brightman, I want your open sanction of my bill to pension those life-savers grown old in the government's most humane arm of service. The bill is the last hope for the ambitions,—for the very lives, even—of so many unrewarded heroes—"

"It establishes a dangerous precedent, Mr. Bly."

"An 'expensive' precedent is what you really mean; yet I have shown how money will be saved by offering inducements that lead the right sort of men to enlist. You must see that an ambitious personnel of satisfied men means fewer wrecks! It will diminish the expenditures made necessary by constant changes—"

"Virtue is no longer, then, its own reward?"

"It is poor recompense for suffering, is it not? Oh, Mr. Brightman, what would I not give to be in your position! Men from Eastport to Cape Nome look to you to give them this great benefit from the great country they so nobly serve! It is an easy thing to kill a bill. Any one of us might do that; but you have power to secure the passage of this splendid measure. Have I your word—?" The good man's voice was trembling.

"No, I think not. I am not prepared—"

"Then do not make any decision, I implore you! Do not commit yourself until you return! I understand you are to join your family on the east coast, and if you do not turn your back on opportunity, you will meet some of our Coast Guard, talk with them, understand them a little, and come back ready to lend them a hand. I wish you a pleasant journey, Congressman Brightman, and an instructive one."

Mr. Bly left the group at once. It was evident that he was deeply moved.

"M-m-m." The Chairman of the Committee lifted his bag. "I bid you good-day, gentlemen." He walked off briskly, and stepped into the waiting cab.

SO IT happened that two nights later, the same stocky figure leaned thoughtfully against a pillar on the porch of the Hotel Kentworth. His face was turned seaward, but he seemed not to notice the raging wind that tore at his greatcoat. He did not turn as one of the bell boys hurried out to move back the chairs from the ravages of the September storm.

"Bad night," Jimmy remarked conclusively, as he busied himself with the scattered furniture. "Pity the fellers at sea tonight."

"You don't like the water?" There was no particular interest in the question.

"Not much, I don't! Seen too much what it can do to you."

"M'm'm. I'm not fond of it, myself." He braced against the pillar and wheeled toward the boy.

"Oh, it's you, Mr. Brightman!" Jimmy's tone was most respectful, as he faced the well-known Congressman, but there was scant cordiality in the discovery, and no liking in his face. He bunched up the chairs and was moving away when a dull boom arrested him.

"What is that?" asked Mr. Brightman.

"Wreck, prob'ly." Jimmy consulted his watch. "Luck!" he announced to himself, joyfully, as he ran inside. "I'm through for the night!"

Three minutes later he darted out a side door and was racing down the walk, when his name was called imperiously.

"Wait, Jimmy! I'm going with you!"

"With me! Guess you don't know where I'm going!"

"Aren't you going to the wreck?"

"In a way. I'm going to the Coast Guard Station."

on legislation," quivered the boy, "especially when the laws are made by men who don't understand the things they're legislatin' about!"

"Such as—?" inquired the Interstate chairman.

"Wrecks!" exploded Jimmy. "Human ones as well as boats."

"Then this is a chance for me to learn something. Here is your chance to help me understand," Jameson Brightman shouted, for they had reached the open shore line, and the gale forced his words back into his throat. He stumbled over the unfamiliar ground, and Jimmy steered him through the down-shutting darkness; away from the station they stopped at the rampart of ledges that were threatening the lives of whosoever clung to the straining vessel that was burning the red light tossing up, tossing down, flickering madly to one side, out there in the howling blackness. If he wanted to learn, he should have a thorough lesson, Jimmy determined.

THE unchecked sweep of wind, fresh off the ocean, with not so much as a blade of grass to break it, was enough to make an old sea-dog falter, and Jimmy was not surprised when his companion clutched his arm in an attempt to signify his willingness to turn toward the hotel's light and warmth and safety.

"Can't do—good—here!" the words came to Jimmy, and with the last of them, from across the water, rang a fearful cry.

"Sounded like a woman!" gasped Jameson Brightman.

"Sure!" bawled Jimmy. "Women—boats, don't they?"

Then there were more cries and shouts and orders that were strong or feeble, as the wind happened to bring them, but always nearer and nearer came the bobbing red light. The two looked down at the hissing combers torn on the jagged blurs in the blackness below them, and they shuddered.

Jimmy it was, then, who tugged at the big man's coat and begged him to go farther out to the station.

"But—something—done!" shrieked the Congressman.

Jimmy pointed to some gray-gleaming figures moving hurriedly on the edge of the shore where the water was pounding hard enough to deafen one to almost anything except those cries that persisted on every backward surge of the breakers.

"Smartest crew—life-savers—coast!" Jimmy made him hear, and he indicated the Coston that burned red in the station tower to proclaim that help was coming.

Mr. Brightman groaned with relief as the slender white line of the life-boat slid over the launchway, but Jimmy shook his head; he had seen the impossible attempted before this by those men down there who had such a fine disregard for their own safety.

With a sudden unison of movement, the men were in the boat; the oars flashed for an instant, straight, upstanding, and fell at exactly the right time on a heaving roll of surf; but the little boat was beaten back like a shingle, spilling the men into the shallow froth. Twice they tried it, and it was splendid to behold such daring; but the ocean had become a supermonster.

It was man's hand with God's help, alone, that must measure against it now.

The carbon reflector leaped, with its ghastly gleam, across the water. It showed the vessel driving before the gale, for her chains had parted. Raked fore and aft by the crashing breakers, the crew had taken to the main rigging, and as a tremendous broadside caught her, she was thrown inshore to within about a hundred feet.

The doomed vessel writhed and quivered in an agony of shock, but Jimmy knew that there was still a chance for it if the gun-line found a true mark. He sent out a silent prayer for the man who was sighting the Lyle gun. Boom! Away sped the line fair between the trembling foremast and the mainmast, and rested on the stays. On the instant a sidewise

"Well, come along." The Congressman started in advance of the boy, who showed no inclination to continue.

"But you—you—" Jimmy caught up with him, distressed, but determined. "As man to man, Mr. Brightman, it's no place for you down there. The men—the men don't feel very friendly toward you since you shut the door on the bill in Congress that was going to give 'em a few square deals. I—well, I wouldn't go down, if I was you."

"The Bly bill hasn't yet been killed," observed the unmoved voice of the man, whose pace never slackened.

"No, most likely you been too busy to bother with it," cried Jimmy, bitterly. Then his young voice poured out a deluge of eager hope. "Say! Mr. Brightman, lemme tell ya what it means to 'em all, will ya? Let's go back, Mr. Brightman, an' I can tell you a whole lot you orter know! Will ya?"

"There's another gun! Come on, Jimmy." The man glanced down at the excited face beside him. "You're pretty well informed on legislation, for a youngster, aren't you?" he asked quizzically.

With the Missionary in Overalls

THE establishment of industrial missions, that newer phase of the missionary's activity which is designed to remove the economic obstacles which tend to defeat his spiritual efforts as the medical missionary seeks to cure bodily ill in order that he may cure soul ill, is pioneer work. There is no well-beaten path to follow, no set of rules to insure success. Each such enterprise must be adapted to the peculiar needs, capabilities and stage of growth of the people it is to serve. But though the industrial mission still is in a state of development, there already are many notable examples of what may be accomplished for Christianity through this agency.

The typical example of industrial missions at present is probably the mission school in India which offers some manual training work as a means of self-support to the student or the station which conducts enterprises serving to teach the natives better methods. Choosing almost at random, we may note instances which show the wide variety of such activities.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has industrial work at Lubefu in its Congo Mission, where considerable building has been done, trees planted, and a village for workmen laid out; and at Wembo Niama, where there is something of agriculture, including cotton, pineapples, coconuts, sugar-cane, peanuts and sweet potatoes, and a carpentry shop where furniture is made and lumber sawed and planed for building. Several buildings have been erected and reroofed and the report says—indicating some ambition for developing industrial work further—"We will have to be always rebuilding and repairing until we can begin making brick and tile with which to build permanently."

The Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa conducts industrial work at many of its stations, notably at Old Umtali in Rhodesia. From the various centers of the work men and women come to Old Umtali to prepare for evangelistic, educational, industrial and general improvement work among the needy people of the kraals. It is recognized that the native must furnish the leadership and the development of out-stations is greatly desired. "When the native Christian leader," says the report, "settles for his task at an out-station and proceeds to improve all of his stock and his gardens, markets some of his produce and begins to live better, the heathen, who had formerly thought such practices only for white men come from far around to see and learn. After a while the standard of living throughout the area is raised." An out-station consists of a pastor-teacher, a pole-and-mud church and a pole-and-mud schoolhouse, centrally located in respect to ten or twenty villages. The people erect the buildings and make and care for the gardens from which the teacher gets his food.

THE American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society has industrial work in India of which these are typical. At Bapatla an industrial mission teaches the Palmyra fibre industry and reclaiming of farm land and conducts the Bapatla Co-operative Association; at Donakonda 280 acres of land are cultivated, the best farming methods being taught; at Udayagiri an industrial department trains masons, carpenters, agriculturists; at Pynmana is a mission school where students are trained in new methods of agriculture, raising pigs and poultry and working in school gardens; at Bessom are several mills owned by native Christians which furnish employment to natives.

The Friends' Church mentions, in reporting on its work at Nowgong, Harpapor and Belari, the handkerchief industry, the raising of mulberry trees and experimenting with silk-worms.

The Kenneth Mackenzie Memorial School at Lakawn, Siam, a Presbyterian Mission, has developed a notable industry in leather, under the direction of a missionary who, seeing the raw material unused and recognizing the value of the industrial work to the people and to the mission, set himself to the development of the industry, though without previous training in the art of tanning leather. He took advantage of his furlough in the United States, consulted busiern agricultural methods, equipping them to return home and "work out their own economic and social betterment."

To what extent the above missions and the scores of others of which they are to some extent typical are touching the economic life of the communities in which they are located it is impossible to say. Commissions of experts would doubtless find much to commend and perhaps also something to criticize. But it is evident that they are not noticeably affecting industrialization.

Happily there may now be cited several examples of industrial missions, or of schools and centers where scientific vocational training is given which, while not in any sense "typical," being far more comprehensive in character than most, still serve to show the possibilities of missions at least where agriculture is concerned.

Perhaps the best examples are the Agricultural Institute at Allahabad, India, the Department of Agriculture and Forestry of Nanking University and the Department of Agriculture of Canton Christian College. The list should perhaps include also the somewhat remarkable work at Lovedale, South Africa, though friendly complaint has been made that while Lovedale is far and away above most industrial schools in Africa, it still turns out, not technicians as does Hampton for instance, but natives who must work under direction. Perhaps also the work of W. Barbroke Grubb among the Chaco Indians of Paraguay should be mentioned. Certain it is that he has done a most notable work in civilizing savages, making large use of agricultural and trade training. Other ventures also may verge toward the significance of the examples to be here described.

THE dramatic story of Sam Higginbottom at Allahabad, India, has often been told. Like other missionaries, Higginbottom found his work blocked by the vast poverty of the people. Unlike many of them he modified his work to meet the conditions. "If the government and missions are justified in any kind of education," he asked, "are they not justified in that kind of education which most directly concerns the great majority of the people in India? Should we not teach these people to get more out of their soil?" For since India is so largely agricultural he thought at once in terms of agricultural training.

After a while his query was answered in harmony with his own eager desire. He was sent home to study agriculture and to raise money for a new sort of missionary venture. When he returned with financial gifts and a degree in animal husbandry from Ohio State University, a college farm of 275 acres had already been obtained. This was stocked and equipped with bungalows, barns, and buildings for dairy purposes, an engine-room, an irrigation plant, and farming implements, many of the latter received from great American concerns—American tractors, reapers, threshing-machines and a deep-well pumping apparatus, capable of giving a million gallons of water a day for irrigation. The underground silo was introduced, an institution of great importance to India, as the loss of cattle in time of famine means a great increase in suffering. An Agricultural Research Institute was developed. A colleague, Don W. Griffin, has introduced a plow, any part of which can be repaired by an Indian blacksmith, and which can be cheaply made.

From the first, boys came to the college farm desiring to earn their way. Boys of the lowest caste and the highest work side by side. To see a poor Christian convert from the sweeper caste plowing in a field along with a wealthy Brahmin of the highest rank is a sight that makes old-time India rub its eyes in amusement. A Hindu of the most sacred caste, himself a landowner, owning ten thousand acres became a student and perspired with the best of them on the mission farm.

The Maharajah of the native Indian State of Gwalior has placed Higginbottom in charge of the agricultural development of his State, setting aside an annual ness men, and finally started his work with two tubs and a few knives. The result of the first year's work was the sale of $1,000 worth of leather goods.

In the Philippines the American Baptist Society maintains the well-known Jaro Industrial School two miles from Iloilo. Upon sixty-five acres of land it has developed the industries of farming, building, painting, cabinet-making, electric-wiring, telegraphy and surveying. There are two school stores managed by students.

In Chile the Methodist Episcopal Church has purchased the Bunster farm of 4,000 acres at Angol, where it plans to train thousands of Chilean peons in mod-budget of $25,000 for the purpose. A project under way is the establishment of a model village in each district of the State and the placing of a student from the mission farm on each. The Maharajah of Bikaner is willing to finance a missionary trained in agriculture to supervise in that state. The Maharajah of Jodhpur has 40,000 square miles to cultivate and wants two agricultural experts. Besides aiding these three states Higginbottom is agricultural adviser to the states of Rutlan, Kotah, Jalawar, Dhar, Jaora and Benares, an area more than double the total area of Great Britain. He was a member of the Imperial Conference on Agricultural Education held in Simla in June, 1917.

Ten-day summer classes for the district board teachers of Allahabad were introduced and a large correspondence is carried on with leading native Hindus in regard to crops, machinery and other agricultural subjects. Graduates of the Agricultural Institute are now scattered here and there throughout the country demonstrating and doing rural work, while the farm itself has become a community center for better farming.

Higginbottom interprets the judgment scene thus: "When you taught that little famine-cursed village to grow twenty bushels of wheat in place of six or eight you were helping to feed the hungry, and when you taught those people how to grow three bales of cotton in place of one, you were helping to clothe the naked."

It would seem that inasfar as the economic situation of India relates to agriculture—and 75 per cent. of her population is agricultural—a solution has been found in the type of work done at the Allahabad Agricultural Institute. If Higginbottom's economic vision for India, as indicated by his own work and by a comprehensive plan which he outlined to the Calcutta University Commission, can be made a reality through adequate gifts of money and lives, India's economic redemption may be at hand.

OUT of the work at Allahabad has grown another economically important venture, the chicken farm at Etah with its extension into the surrounding district—established first to provide work and a means of self-support for the boys of the Etah Boarding School.

Etah is at the heart of a mass movement area where chicken-raising is a hereditary occupation among 15,000 village Christians from the depressed classes, scattered in hundreds of villages over a district of 2,800 square miles.

Experiment at Etah with imported breeds showed Arthur E. Slater, the poultry expert in charge, that while thoroughbreds could not stand the climate a vigorous breed was secured through crossing with indigenous varieties. The work of the Industrial Department at Etah is under two divisions, the Central Station and the District. At the first there is grading, packing, testing for freshness and despatch of market eggs; the sale of eggs for hatching and stock to the public; correspondence and the publication of leaflets; and conducting the yearly Etah Poultry Show. Fowls weighing more than twice as much as the scrawny Eastern type and eggs double the size of the ordinary egg are exhibited to interested natives. The district work consists of the distribution of pure-bred eggs for hatching in the villages and the purchase of market eggs from the people. The aim is to form a series of "egg circles," such as have proved successful in Denmark and Australia. There is an unlimited demand for table-eggs of high quality, and shipments are made to Agra, Delhi, Lucknow, Cawnpore, and other cities.

One Christian who won the prize at the Poultry Show expressed his gratitude by opening work in four different villages and an itinerant elder commended work in twenty-one villages by the expedient of distributing properly bred eggs for hatching.

THE story of Nanking University College of Agriculture and Forestry is perhaps as interesting and important as the work at Allahabad. Joseph Bailie, Professor of Mathematics in Nanking University, set himself to a more fundamental task in regard to China's famine sufferers than

At Old Umtali in Rhodesia the native learns how to mend his farm tools and do forge work. He thus can help his neighbors when he returns to his own community that in which he found missionaries engaged. He secured tracts of land on Purple Mountain, organized refugees to clear and drain the land, selected from these the more capable to place as settled tenants, expecting them to support themselves after the first harvest and to pay taxes sufficient to meet the government tax and interest on the money expended in giving them a start. After awhile additional acres bushes or chop down trees and shrubs that had grown up around the graves of their ancestors. Out of it too grew the School of Forestry of the University of Nanking. The establishment of a Tree Seed Exchange is part of the venture. Chinese seeds are purchased in preference to others, the money thus going to the poor of China who could be enlisted in collecting seed, and the children being taught the value of forests.

There has been the deliberate effort to stimulate the government. Provincial governors come from far to see the work and go back to start a similar enterprise.

The later history of the college is equally significant. The work in sericulture has to do with experiments in the cultivation of mulberry trees—pruning, fertilizing, drafting and culture—and with the production of silk-worm eggs according to approved scientific method, and the distribution of these eggs to the farmers.

Notable work is being done in the cultivation of cotton, China being one of the great cotton producers of the world. The college is trying out foreign varieties to learn which is best adapted to each section of the country with the aim of producing seeds for distribution to farmers.

Sericulture and cotton form but two of several important undertakings by the college.

A SOMEWHAT similar venture in another part of China is the Canton Christian College under the very able direction of President Charles J. Edmunds, educator and scientist.

Dr. Edmunds thinks of China in world terms, dreaming of the time when she shall take her part in the world as a strong nation with material and spiritual contribution to the whole social process. To this end his college is devoted to the problem of developing both material resources and also the intellect and soul of the people. One of the most significant departments of the College is the agricultural. The special staff in agriculture includes besides the head of the biology department as entomologist, two Americans experienced in horticulture and animal culture—representatives respectively of the collegiate missions of the Pennsylvania State College and the Kansas State Agricultural College—one Chinese educated in America as agronomist and several experienced Chinese agriculturists secured locally.

Twenty-five acres are under special cultivation, the products being rice, foreign and Chinese vegetables and fruit; and there is dairying and hog breeding according to scientific method. Rice culture is being improved by selection and sericulture through the production of silk-worms free from disease; a study of the diseases of the lychee and of citrus fruits will be of importance to California and Florida as well as to China. A herbarium exchanges with museums throughout the world.

There are indications that the Nanking University College of Agriculture and Forestry and the Canton Christian College are exerting a large influence upon missionary policy in China and upon governmental policy as well.

The Angelus

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN war swept over France many of the church bells were confiscated and were made into cannon balls to feed the ever-hungry enemy guns. Their going left the people without the symbol of their faith—the call to prayer, the invitation to divine service, the voice that tolled for wedding and for funeral.

Recognizing the importance of this symbol in the lives of the people and seeing an opportunity to make a permanent and constructive memorial to the "beloved dead" who fell, the American Committee for Devastated France has created a fund, "The Angelus Bell Fund," for the purpose of restoring, through the medium of the bell some degree of stability, idealism and joy in the devastated area.

THEY stand so silent, so alone, so lost in quiet prayer,
It seems as if the hand of God is spread above them, there.
It seems as if His tender eyes, so filled with love, can know
That rapture fills their tired souls with life's warm afterglow.

The bells had been so long away since war first spread its pall Above the land—since raiders came and carried off their all—
The bells had been destroyed for food to feed the hungry guns,
To farther devastate their homes, their husbands and their sons!

All through the weary years of war they heard no call to praise—
Their burials went all untolled, uncounted were the days—
The brides went musicless to wed, the Church's valiant arm Seemed shrunken, somehow; at a loss to keep its flock from harm.

* * * *

But now the bells are back again—how joyously they ring!
And workers in the shell-torn fields hark to the song they sing;
They stand so silent, so alone, so lost in quiet prayer,
It seems as if the hand of God is spread above them, there!

Glimpses into Savage Lives

Religious Beliefs of the Indians of the Northwest Coast

By SARAH ENDICOTT OBER

FEW whites have gained an insight into Indian minds, or a true knowledge of their occultism. But often the key of kindness or sympathetic understanding unlocks the barred portal and discloses marvelous meanings in barbarous ceremonies or heathenish practices. The Indian has a symbolic representation for every spiritual belief, a ceremonial for each historic tradition, a dance for every observance, and these are interwoven into the warp and web of his very being. With no written chronicles, no recorded annals, religious beliefs and traditions were handed down from generation to generation, losing much of primal truth and original conception in transmission. Thus ideals of noble conception or beautiful meaning degenerated into harmful and even horrible practices.

The Indian religion, spiritualistic in the extreme, was based upon belief in spirits ranging from Sahg-a-lie Tyee, the great supreme creator and ruler of the universe, through an infinity of spirits to Klail or Lejob Ta-mahn-a-wis, or the devil, with all his demoniac train. The latter was more often worshipped than Sahg-a-lie Tyee, for he needed to be conciliated or propitiated, or he would work harm. But Sahg-a-lie Tyee was so merciful and beneficent he did not need to be worshipped. To savage minds natural phenomena were attributed to supernatural powers or spirits, and the earth, sun, moon, stars, mountains, rivers, lakes and ocean, had each its mythical ta-mahn-a-wis or spirit. Each tree, bush, stone or stick was personified, or rather, spiritualized, having a ta-mahn-a-wis, and power for working good or evil. And every Indian had his ta-mahn-a-wis or guardian spirit, to obtain which the Indian boys had to undergo terrible ordeals in utter isolation and solitude. When reaching the age of puberty, they were sent forth into the wilderness to fast, pray and purge their bodies, and endure trials of physical endurance and rites of purification until a state of bodily exhaustion and mental clairvoyance was reached. Then the first beast, bird or fish that passed before their half-crazed vision, became their "medicine" or ta-mahn-a-wis for life. It was ever sacred to them and nothing could induce them to kill or harm it, for that would bring misfortune or death. In that ordeal the character and after life of the lad was moulded for good or evil, according to natural bent, and yielded to the control of good or evil spirits.

AN OLD Cowhechian Indian told me about the first Catholic priest who visited his people. Thousands of Indians were gathered at the mouth of the Fraser river to catch salmon, when this Black-gown, as they called him, came among them. In great wonder they gazed upon this strange being with his pale face. They watched him set up his cross, and paraphernalia for service, and when he lighted his candles, they all fell on their faces, bowed in worship of the ta-mahn-a-wis piah, or "sacred fire." Never before had they seen fire in that form and to their awed minds it was supernatural. Imagine that scene—the black-robed priest engaged in worship, the great primeval forest against which stood the cross and shone the flickering candles, that vast multitude of bowed, naked forms, filling the natural amphitheater.

And from the forest sprang two Cowhechian boys, frenzied by their fastings and physical sufferings, and before them they saw their ta-mahn-a-wis, their "medicine" for which they had vainly sought. Over the bowed multitude they leaped, springing from bare shoulder to shoulder, babbling in their uncouth tongue, and gripped the startled priest with frenzied clutch, beseeching him to "bless" them. The old men had taught them to hold on to their ta-mahn-a-wis until they received a blessing, so nothing could break their hold. The frightened priest supposed this to be an attack upon his life, and struggled to free himself, but they clung the tighter. Somehow he broke loose, fleeing into the wilds, never to be seen again, leaving his torn robe, cross and candles behind. And these relics were cherished by the boys as their "sacred medicine," throughout their lives. It was not until years afterwards, when a Catholic priest came to the Cowhechians to live with them and reveal Christ to them, that they comprehended that first ceremonial.

"Ta-mahn-a-wis" is used as noun, adjective or decoctions which so disfigured or affected their unfortunate victims that death would have been a merciful release. Woe to the man or woman who offended them, or refused to give allegiance to them! Each medicine man had his secret and peculiar death box, containing all sorts of gruesome objects, dried portions of human or animal bodies, poison sacs of snakes and other articles supposed to possess devilish powers.

Very strange diagnoses were made by these "devil doctors," for they attributed most ailments to some evil "spirit" which had taken possession of the sick one, or to some foreign object "thrown" into him by an enemy. After locating the trouble, the next step was to catch and expel it. Noise appeared to bear prominent part in the medicine man's practices, and his incantations were accompanied by lusty beatings of tomtoms and drums, and by sticks struck sharply upon resounding boards. Neighbors and relatives of the patient assisted in this mad pandemonium, crowding the house and vociferating in wild chorus. Stripped to the waist, the medicine man had everything that could rattle attached to his medicine belt—wristlets and anklets, claws, shells, hoofs and nails, all rattling in sharp accompaniment to his wild dancings and antics. In his hand his own ta-mahn-a-wis rattle bore prominent part in his performances. Prancing and dancing about the sick one, he postured grotesquely, varying proceedings by occasionally pouncing upon him, pummeling, kneading and squeezing the afflicted part, and sucking it until blood was drawn through the skin. This was evidently the sign that he had trailed the "spirit" and was drawing it out.

Sometimes he declared that a bit of bone, wood or feather had been "thrown into" the sick one, and after great proceedings he professed to have secured this, and held it up triumphantly before his awed audience. This he had produced craftily by sleight-of-hand, not from "up his sleeve" as he was nearly naked, but from his matted hair or medicine belt. When he had secured the troublesome "devil," he proceeded to "drown it" in a vessel of water, making prodigious struggles as if it required his whole strength. Sometimes the "gnawing spirit" which had caused lung trouble or rheumatism was drawn out by the medicine man inhaling it with vigorous suckings, and then he rushed to the door and expelled it in great puffs, blowing it far out into space, or over the sea. The sick ta-mahn-a-wis was sometimes continued for days, until the poor patient either recovered or, as was more often the case, died.

IN INDIAN villages remote from civilization the chant of the medicine man and the monotonous beat of tomtom and drum are often heard, and often they are succeeded by the woeful "wailings" for the dead. Like many Oriental peoples, the Indians have this custom of wailing the dead, and sometimes hired "mourners" perform this function. I have seen many an Indian woman sitting in the dust, her hair cut short in token of mourning, and filling the air day and night with her wailings.

Among the savage tribes of the west coast of Vancouver island, some medicine men, called the Elites, were demoniac in their horrible practices. At certain seasons of the year they went into the wilds to perform their fastings and self-tortures to receive greater power in their evil arts. The maniacal yells announcing their return sent every Indian into hiding, for the crazed demoniacs would seize the first animals or persons they met, and bite and tear them horribly. I have seen old women still bearing the scars inflicted by Elites, and one chief carried to his grave the terrible scars inflicted by mad fanatics when he interposed between them and his people.

verb, and there were four principal ta-mahn-a-wis ceremonials, as well as numerous lesser ones. The sick ta-mahn-a-wis was practised for bodily healing; the spirit ta-mahn-a-wis for spiritual blessings; the red or Pil-Pil (blood) ta-mahn-a-wis, a winter pastime, invoked material success or prosperity, or chronicled traditional and historic events; the black or Klail (devil) ta-mahn-a-wis was a very secret observance, a kind of Indian free-masonry, whose dreadful mysteries can only be surmised. Each ceremonial had its own peculiar practices, masks, and body-paintings, as well as dances.

THE sick ta-mahn-a-wis was presided over by a medicine man who held despotic sway over the superstitious Indians. These conjurors combined some knowledge of natural remedies, with more diabolic abominations, and kept their subjects in abject terror. To propitiate them or to pay them for practicing sick ta-mahn-a-wis, the Indians gave them gifts galore. Some medicine men used natural remedies, but many were possessed by demoniac powers, past masters in hypnotism, mesmerism and witchcraft. They could concoct poison so deadly that an atom would cause death. And they had other Indians had landed on Puget Sound where this missionary had held his services a few weeks before, and he came to hold another meeting there. The place was deserted when he arrived in his canoe, but from the woods all around came strange sounds like birds, the like of which he had never heard before. A great fire blazed up, lighting the sky, and he approached the little prairie upon which it was built. Upon a large platform near it were piled blankets, canoes, pressed fish, berry cakes, wampum, beads, everything that an Indian possessed, for a grand potlatch. The only person in sight was an old squaw bound to a stake. He asked her in Chinook what it all meant. "Free potlatch—devil dance," she wailed.

The full moon rose red in the smoky air and the sounds grew louder and wilder, until hundreds of yelling, painted, masked Indians poured out of the woods into the open space. Some were on all fours, some had masks representing grotesque beasts, birds or fishes, some had on crude wings or tails. Last came the Elites, attended by raving squaws. These tore the flesh from the arms of any who were not found at the dance at a certain hour. To the beat of drums and blowing of shells a great circle was formed and the dance began. Great gifts were bestowed as at a pow-wow or wah-wah. This was a ta-mahn-a-wis or spirit dance, or rather a "devil dance."

The missionary asked an exhausted chief the next day why they worshipped the devil. "Good Spirit always good—we no fear Him. But must please the devil—he harm you. When all well, happy—good ta-mahn-a-wis—when all wrong—bad ta-mahn-a-wis mamok" (work).

EACH medicine man had his own special fetish or totem, from which he professed to gain his power. Many days and nights were spent before it in silent, secret imbibings of its supernatural qualities. Again he would dance, howl, sing and talk to it, or practice weird incantations before it. Often this was but a hideous image, or perhaps but a charred stick, ornamented with feathers, but its great powers were never doubted. And genuine witchcraft was wrought by these medicine men, men and women dying from their devilish arts.

Yet some of the medicine men were skilled in natural remedies. One from a Willapa Harbor tribe was remarkable for his fine traits and great skill in healing.

The Indians have strong belief in the "evil eye," and bewitchment, and have many charms to ensure safety from these. The Puget Sound Indians used to believe in a stick ta-mahn-a-wis, or "wood spirit" credited with having power to change people into toads, birds, beasts or reptiles. They used to have totems, masks, rattles and other charms against this mythical being. Other tribes believed in Daska-bull, who had the same powers and who taught the Twana Indians how to make fish-traps and other useful arts.

What marvelous changes this Indian woman, said to be more than 100 years old, has seen among her people

Great prints in the rocks on Hood's canal, with vague resemblance to a mammoth footprint are supposed to have been made by him.

I have a Cloyoquot medicine man's rattle but I never knew its significance until it was revealed by a Makah Indian. This man had never been as far north, neither had he ever met one of the Cloyoquot tribe, but from the bird shape he knew where the rattle came from. On the handle reaching from the bird's head to its tail were carved two lizard-shaped figures. These showed him that it had belonged to a powerful medicine man, because there were two figures. Between them on top of the handle was a crude form of a man, and beneath on the body of the bird were diagonal lines representing the death river, over which the souls of men must pass after leaving this world to reach the spirit world. Because the man was nearly over that river, the owner of the rattle must have had power to bring back the soul, even when it had almost passed over the river of death. Within the bird, which was cunningly cut in halves, were old lead bullets to make it rattle.

CHRISTIANITY and civilization have rapidly weakened the power and hold of the medicine men over their followers, and only in remote reservations can they still keep their superstitious sway. Many an old Indian has given up utterly the ancient beliefs and customs and has been faithful to the Saviour and the Church. So the old Shamens are very bitter and fiercely antagonistic to missionaries opposing them in every possible way. Yet even some of these poor deluded souls have been touched by arrows of conviction and yielded themselves to Christ.

Only a few months ago I heard the account of such a conversion. On the coast near the Frazer river lived a famous medicine man, a powerful "devil doctor," who was feared by all the Indians who knew him. He seemed wholly destitute of humane principles, and utterly given over to evil influences. His face reflected his bad character, being "klait—bad—black like devil," as my informant told me. In some mysterious way God touched that heart, arousing in it strange longings to know Christ. For a long time these struggled within his soul, growing stronger and stronger, until he could not practice his black arts any longer. He went into the wilderness to fast and pray—as the Indians say to "let his whole heart take hold of God." One night he had a vision of the Saviour, and returned to his home transformed, confessing Jesus as his Master.

As in my glimpses into savage lives I get glimpses into groping souls, and see how God's Holy Spirit has been leading them out from heathen darkness—out from awful superstition and terror—into His marvelous light, I am filled with wonder and awe. They have had so little and such poor Gospel teaching—have borne so great wrongs and oppression—have had everything to hinder and discourage them, yet their faith and trust in God and their simple acceptance of the in-dwelling Christ are marvelous.

The Girl in Sprigged Muslin

THE girls of the Cloverdale High School were holding a class meeting to discuss the problems and the plans that had to do with graduation day. And, because they were just girls—young, and pretty, and full of the joy and excitement of a new experience—their talk ran very largely in the direction of clothes. For what girl—at graduation time—isn't interested in clothes? What girl can think connectively of prize essays and valedictories and diplomas when there's a graduation frock to be made?

"I'm going to have a white crêpe de chine dress," the fluffy blonde girl, who had been voted the prettiest in the class, told the rest. "I'm going to have it made with inserts of very fine valenciennes lace. And I'm going to have little white flowers, made of satin ribbon, at half-inch intervals around the neck and sleeves."

"That," said the dark girl with the great coil of hair that she had just learned to do high upon her head, "that will be perfectly stunning! Now, I'm going to have a taffeta dress with rows and rows of little ruffles, all hemstitched, on the skirt. It will rustle when I walk. And it will rustle when I sit down. And it will rustle when I stand up—" she laughed.

The auburn-haired girl—who had been voted the second prettiest in the class—was speaking.

"I like a soft silk, myself," she said slowly. "I guess that I'll have a very satiny charmeuse gown. And I think that I'll have it made ever so plain—but rich. I like good lines and not a great deal of trimming."

SO THE talk ran—for most of the girls in the Cloverdale High School had well-to-do parents. The conversation touched upon every variety of expensive fabric—it embraced the qualities and quantities of real lace, and hand-embroidery, and ribbon, and silver braid. And then, at last, when nearly every one had told just what she was expecting to wear, there was a sudden pause. For it was Mary Carson's turn to speak.

Mary Carson's mother was a widow with a small annuity. She was one of the best women in Cloverdale—her friendly hand was always stretched out to help those in trouble and her meager purse was never shut against a real need. But her tiny cottage was very modest and Mary, her one child, was never permitted to indulge in even the mildest sort of extravagance. Perhaps that was the reason for the moment of silence before one of the girls asked a question.

"What," asked the girl, with a trifle of embarrassment, "what are you going to wear, Mary?"

Often She Is Clothed Far More Appropriately Than the One in Silk

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Mary Carson smiled pleasantly. She was an attractive girl, with smooth pink cheeks and bright, blue eyes. If she shared in her classmate's embarrassment, she did not show it.

"Why," she said cheerfully. "Mother is helping me to make up a sprigged muslin. I'm putting ever so many of the finest little tucks on the skirt and waist. I'm doing every stitch by hand."

There was a second pause—a shade longer perhaps. And then another girl spoke.

"But, Mary," she said tactlessly, "you'll look so different from the rest of us! We're all going to have silk dresses."

Mary Carson smiled again, as she answered. And her voice was just as pleasant as it had been.

"Yes," she said slowly, "I know that I'll look different from the rest of you. Mother and I talked that all over. And Mother said that perhaps—if we scrimp a lot on other things—we might manage the sort of clothes that you all are having. But I told her that I'd rather wear a muslin dress that I knew we could afford than a silk dress that I knew we couldn't afford!"

THERE aren't many girls—or many men either—that learn the value of sprigged muslin (and all that sprigged muslin stands for) as early as Mary Carson learned it. It usually takes a good many years, and a deal of bitter experience, to realize that the best and most suitable thing—be it a home, or a garment, or an ambition—is the one that we can truly afford.

I have known so many people who feel that it is necessary to follow—on a sprigged-muslin income—the lead of folk who can wear silk. Because the Smiths are buying an automobile it becomes necessary for the Browns to have one; and because the girl next door has a grand piano, the old parlor organ suddenly takes on a raucous tone. Many people insist on entertaining extensively, upon living in elaborate quarters, upon going upon expensive trips and acquiring luxurious habits because they're afraid of "being different from the rest."

"Perhaps John White does make more money than you do," I once heard a woman say to her harassed husband. "Perhaps they can swing their establishment more easily than we can. But you don't want the neighbors to think we aren't as good as the Whites, do you? Haven't you got any pride?"

"Oh, I suppose I have," groaned the husband, "but pride's a mighty heavy load to carry, sometimes. If we could only cut down, a little, on all of this pretense—"

But he didn't finish. His wife, with one glance, had silenced him.

WHEN one is willing to admit—as Mary Carson was—that it's no crime to be different from the folk who have more money to spend on unessentials, there is a great deal accomplished. When false pride has assumed its proper place in the every-day scale of living, that scale of living is very apt to go down—instead of up!

Sometimes it requires real bravery to speak up, as Mary Carson did, in front of a group of people. It isn't easy to admit that it's necessary to shave off a dollar there. It's hard to confess that economy is necessary. But after the admission has been made—after the group of people have been faced—a rather comfortable feeling is quite likely to creep into the heart. And the sprigged muslin will, without doubt, give its wearer a very pleasant feeling.

The world, for a good many years, seems to have been trying madly to wear silk. Perhaps that is why there has been so much unrest—so much war and famine and unemployment and bitter sorrow. Perhaps that is why kingdoms have tottered and monarchs have been massacred and peaceful fields have been drenched with the warm, red blood of armies. Perhaps that is why there has been so much talk of social revolutions and wage scales and strikes. Perhaps that is why it has been hard to stretch our budgets to meet every demand.

It's possible—by scrimping in many ways—to wear silk dresses when all of the rest are wearing them. But one silk dress leads to another—and to another. And the scrimping is curiously certain to end in unhappiness and discontent.

It's better—and this rule applies to business firms and to nations, to small communities and to worldwide conditions—to do as Mary Carson did.

It's better—far better—to wear the sprigged muslin that we know we can afford than the silk that we realize to be beyond our means!

Wonderful News from China

THE China Famine Fund opened by the Christian Herald last November, and later expanded with the appointment of a national committee by President Wilson as the American Committee for China Famine Fund, has closed its appeal as the result of cable messages from the committee in Peking, supported by the United States Minister, Charles R. Crane. These messages told of sudden heavy rains and of Chinese contributions that were larger than had been anticipated, the two circumstances making further effort in the United States for actual famine relief unnecessary.

The success of relief activities has been complete, although some post-famine problems remain to be considered, including those of the care of orphans, rehabilitation of family life, the re-stocking of farms and the reconstruction of homes. So far as surveys at present available indicate, the mortality rate has been held down to a point heretofore unheard of in China's periods of famine. To the great family of Christian Herald readers we believe much of this success is due. It was their spontaneous response to the story of famine conditions which we published last autumn that brought about the organization of the national campaign for relief funds, and it was their unwavering support of the cause that inspired as much as any other single factor the growth of interest in China's tragedy among the public at large.

A total of approximately seven million dollars has gone from the United States to China for famine relief of which the readers of the Christian Herald to this day have contributed $562,279.44. Through an acute famine period of six months, this means that our family circle has saved the lives of more than 180,000 men, women and children.

The American Committee, with its headquarters at the offices of the Christian Herald, now has under consideration a question which not only is vital to China, but to the entire world. It has enlisted the sympathy of technical experts and is undertaking to develop a program of famine prevention work applicable to those territories in China especially susceptible to flood or drought famines out of which is expected to grow a permanent commission for anti-famine work. By this means three big problems in the life of the new republic may be solved. First—the establishment of life in North China on a stable economic basis. Second—a vast increase in the natural productive power of the people. Third—the removal from the minds of the natives of the constant fear of destitution and death from starvation.

The appeal for relief, carried into every corner of the land in the last few months, has done other things, however. It has made the American people infinitely better acquainted with China and the Chinese; it has cemented the bonds of friendship that have linked together China and the United States for decades; it has encouraged China in her struggles to attain political and economic independence, and it has proved to the world again the spirit of generosity that possesses this nation and that makes it the friend and helper of the poor everywhere. Moreover it has given an impetus to Christian mission effort in China that probably no other single circumstance could have developed.

The readers of the Christian Herald are to be warmly congratulated and most heartily thanked for their part in this great work. A final report of the numerous activities in which the American Committee has engaged, and a statement of the methods by which the money raised was distributed, will be prepared and made public in the near future.

Open-Air Evangelism

WITH the coming of summer we look forward to an active season of evangelism in the open. In our big cities the workers are preparing for a vigorous spiritual campaign. Year after year we note the increasing earnestness of the efforts put forth by the leaders who are hopeful of reaching the unchurched population with an outdoors' Gospel; yet this work is frequently found the hardest of any they can undertake.

Assistance Offered to Pueblo

WHEN the floods which overcame Pueblo, Colo., assumed serious proportions and dispatches indicated very heavy loss of life and property, the Christian Herald took immediate steps to place its services at the disposal of the authorities of the city. The fact that we have several score subscribers in Pueblo who presumably were among those affected by the disaster, naturally increased our eagerness to assist in meeting the emergency. The following telegram was immediately sent to the Mayor of Pueblo:

"Christian Herald deeply sympathizes with you and people of your city in your terrible trials. This magazine has many friends in Pueblo and desires to be of all possible assistance to them and whole community. Can we help in any way with money or supplies?
(Signed) GRAHAM PATTERSON, Publisher."

At the same time the following telegram was sent to Rev. C. M. Benight, who is a Christian Herald subscriber:

"Please get in touch with Mayor regarding telegram just sent to him offering Christian Herald aid. Letter following. Deepest sympathy."

In a letter sent to him the same day we urged him to do everything required to aid the Christian Herald readers, a list of whom accompanied the letter. That the situation as a whole is being very well taken care of is indicated by this response to the message addressed to the Mayor:

"Thanks for the offer. Will advise you of needs if situation becomes acute."
(Signed) JAMES L. LOVERN, Commissionaire.

No response has been received as yet from Mr. Benight, but the Christian Herald stands ready to forward any assistance necessary to its readers who may have suffered losses from the flood. We are sure our friends in all parts of the United States will join us in our expression of sympathy and our desire to alleviate the suffering that must inevitably follow in the wake of such a catastrophe as descended on Pueblo.

This is all the more singular when it is remembered that, as one writer has aptly expressed it, "The Gospel was born in the open air." The teachings of Jesus, wherein He reached the common people, were almost exclusively given to outdoor gatherings. And in a very large sense it was the same with those of His disciples and with the Gospel leaders of early apostolic times. Long afterward, in days of persecution and hardship, many of the notable triumphs of the Gospel were won in the open, where eager multitudes listened to the earnest appeals of speakers who of necessity were compelled to talk vigorously so that the message might reach every ear.

There is a physical strain attendant on outdoor preaching, it is true, but that need never prove an obstacle to the man with a real mission to save souls. If he be a true worker, zealous to win men, God will give him both a voice and a message. He will have the inspiration that comes of contact with the great outdoors, with the heavens as a canopy, deriving strength and courage from these conditions.

May the outdoor Gospel this summer be the means of winning multitudes to Christ! God's people everywhere should help it by their prayers and their gifts. Let them not forget, in assembling in their churches, to plead the cause of the great masses who never enjoy that privilege, and to pray that they may be brought in from the highways and byways, and to know the joy of salvation.

Mont-Lawn Reopens

MONT-LAWN opens again this week! The beautiful Children's Home on the heights above the mighty Hudson never has looked more enticing and never has extended a warmer welcome to its little friends from the tenements of New York than at this, the opening of its twenty-eighth season.

Established and supported through the generosity of the readers of the Christian Herald, Mont-Lawn will take from the city's byways and refresh and rebuild 3500 boys and girls this summer who otherwise would have their glimpses of the sun from the steaming pavements of canyon streets.

It is "The Children's Paradise," this Mont-Lawn. From its light airy dormitories, its well-equipped play grounds, its swimming and wading pools and its great dining hall to its quiet, subdued chapel and its cosy library and writing-room, it is made for children. Their happiness and comfort and well-being are the only considerations that govern the staff. Everything belongs to the little guests. It is their home; and they take wonderful pride in it and pride in themselves in the setting it provides for them.

We look forward to this twenty-eighth season as the most successful in the history of the work, but in the end this success depends largely on the good friends of children, far and wide, whose generous contributions and loving thoughts make the work possible.

This Country's Need

THE one great need of the United States is a genuine REVIVAL of Jesus Christ's RELIGION.

The recent race riots in Oklahoma emphasize this need.

The reckless waste of the people's money in voting for a $500,000,000 navy emphasizes it.

The growing Sunday desecration and enormous expenditure for frivolous amusements emphasizes it.

The hatred of different classes of society demands it.

The scandal of divorces exceeding anything known in history, except the history of Japan, emphasizes the need of RELIGION in the heart of this nation.

The pagan profiteering, which has robbed the people of billions of money with no steps taken against it, worth mentioning, demands a complete upheaval of standards. And nothing will bring it except a RELIGIOUS REVIVAL in the heart of this nation.

This nation does not need a revision of the TARIFF in order to bring in prosperity. It needs RELIGION!

This nation does not need increased trade with other nations in order to restore prosperity. It needs RELIGION in the heart.

Pray for a revival of RELIGION in these United States if you love your country. True patriotism at the present moment calls for a love of God and brother man.

America's need is a RELIGIOUS REVIVAL! We have loved our country. It is time now, if we want to love her for her future salvation, that we love our God and our Fellow Man.

The great need is RELIGION. Not statesmanship. Not diplomacy. Not economics. Not politics. Not laws, but RELIGION, the RELIGION of Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of the world.

Race Self-Control

WHEN the race riots were going on at Tulsa, Oklahoma, where negroes were killed and maimed and the part of the city where most of them had their homes was being burned by the mob, the Kansas State Federation of Colored Women's Clubs was holding its annual convention at Topeka.

In the midst of all the excitement among the delegates, some of whom had near relatives in Tulsa, the President of the Federation, Mrs. Charles Childs, stood up and calmly spoke these words which are worthy of being preserved among the noblest utterances of any race:

"This is a time for us to prove to a watching world that we are women of a great race. To the masses we are only known by what John and Henry and Tom do. Let us by our example today and in the coming days prove that we are capable of great good beyond the dreams of even those who are faithful friends today and believe in us. There is only one thing that will carry us over this chasm of terror and that is faith in God and love of each other."

Any race that can exhibit self-control like that, and then go on, as these negro women did, with the regular work and program of their convention, is a race that has the highest possibilities in it. One of the other speakers of this convention expressed the firm conviction that there were plenty of good white people in Tulsa and in the nation to see that justice was dealt out to all who suffered and that the guilty would be punished. She also counseled the delegates to be calm and believe in the ultimate triumph of law.

The Chamber of Commerce and the good citizens of Tulsa may rebuild the homes of the negroes that were destroyed by the mob, and make all the redress possible for the actions of those who, through their race hatred, put a stain on civilization. And in making restitution, the citizens will do well. But words like those of Mrs. Childs will do more to command respect and in the end make impossible even mob folly.

Obregon Rejects U. S. Proposals for Treaty Carrying Recognition

GENERAL ALVARO OBREGON, President of Mexico, has rejected proposals of the United States for a treaty which would carry with it American recognition of his government, according to despatches from Mexico City, but the negotiations are being continued and officials in Washington expressed confidence they would be concluded successfully.

The Mexican policy of the Harding administration and the basic conditions upon which the Obregon régime may obtain recognition were defined clearly in an official statement issued by Secretary Hughes after a cabinet meeting at which the Mexican situation was discussed fully. Recognition would be accorded not through a formal announcement but through the negotiation of a treaty, the conclusion of which will result automatically in the recognition of the government in Mexico making it.

The fundamental question, Secretary Hughes declared, "is the safeguarding of property rights against confiscation. Mexico is free to adopt any policy which she pleases with respect to her public lands, but she is not free to destroy without compensation valid titles which have been obtained by American citizens under Mexican laws. . . . This question should not be confused with any matter of personalities or of the recognition of any particular administration. Whenever Mexico is ready to give assurances that she will perform her fundamental obligation in the protection both of persons and of rights of property validly acquired, there will be no obstacle to the most advantageous relations between the two peoples."

Mexico City newspapers, apparently officially inspired, declared that President Obregon would sign no treaty until his government had been recognized, and denied that he possessed the right to conclude a treaty of a political nature. A statement issued by the Mexican Foreign Office said that "In the political phase, the American note was objectionable, because it contained stipulations which were contrary to the precepts of the Mexican Constitution, and which the President, who must, first of all, have regard for the Constitution, has no power to accept." The Obregon régime has been having difficulties at home, with formidable Bolshevik elements menacing its stability and a reactionary faction threatening opposition. President Obregon has stated that the provisions of the Constitution of 1917 regarding which Washington seeks guarantees are not to be enforced in a retroactive or confiscatory manner, but he probably fears the signing of a formal treaty to that effect would weaken his position seriously.

A Presidential decree issued in Mexico City added an average of 25 per cent. to the export taxes which petroleum companies operating in Mexico must pay. The new tax, which is expected to net $15,000,000 a year, will be used solely for payments on Mexico's foreign debt. American oil men declared the increase, if enforced, would virtually suspend oil production in Mexico, as it would bring the total tax up to a third of the value of the product, and prepared for an appeal to the American State Department.

Estimates of Pueblo Death Toll Decrease

CHECKING up on the fatalities of the Pueblo flood has shown, happily, that the toll of life was not as great as was feared at first. Early reports said 132 bodies had been recovered from the wreckage of the Colorado city; two days later the City Health Commissioner gave the number as 83; and after a week it was established that 49 bodies had been recovered in the city and 46 at points down the river—a total of 95 known dead. A revised list of missing issued by the local chapter of the Red Cross, which is in charge of the relief work in the flood, contained 231 names.

In the La Junta district it was announced that eighteen persons were known to have perished from the flood, and that the property damage was $1,000,000.

Estimates of the property loss throughout the flooded area have increased instead of decreasing, and Major L. D. Blauvelt, state highway engineer, placed at $20,000,000 the cost of repairing the highways and bridges of the state. In the Pueblo district it was believed the damage would be nearer $15,000,000 than $10,000,000. A joint resolution adopted by Congress directed the Secretary of War to extend aid

HOW PUEBLO'S STREETS APPEARED AS THE FLOOD WATERS RECEDED

This photograph, taken in Grand Street, gives some idea of the destruction but the camera is inadequate to record the extent of the disaster which overtook the city and made available for that purpose the whole or any part of $1,000,000.

The energy with which the people of Pueblo set about clearing away the wreckage, caring for those made homeless by the flood and laying plans for rebuilding won the admiration of the entire country.

Pittsburgh Pastors Assert Independence

PITTSBURGH clergymen and the Employers' Association are engaged in a controversy of far more than local importance, involving as it does an attempt to restrict the activities and attention of the churches and religious organizations in the industrial field to the so-called "neutral zone" of urging co-operation, conference and good-will.

The Employers' Association objected to the statement of social and industrial principles known as "The Social Ideals of the Churches," originally worked out by the Federal Council of Churches and later adopted by national conventions of the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and other religious bodies. When some of these organizations were seeking funds in the city the Employers' Association issued a series of communications urging the withholding of contributions.

This attitude was attacked vigorously in a resolution adopted unanimously at a meeting of the Union Ministerial Union of Pittsburgh, reading as follows:

"Whereas, The Secretary of the Pittsburgh Employers' Association has issued a series of communications, with the purpose of dissuading men from furnishing financial support to certain Christian organizations because the ministers have not limited their messages to a so-called 'neutral zone,' prescribed by those whom the said secretary represents; and whereas this involves as a principle and as a purpose the dictation to religious bodies as to what fields of thought and human service they may enter, and as to what constitutes the Gospel of the Kingdom, and

"Whereas, the Church throughout all its history, whenever true to its mission, has zealously guarded its absolute freedom to proclaim the full Gospel of Jesus Christ without dictation of any outside parties or any external authority, and

"Whereas, the Pittsburgh Employers' Association, through its secretary, represents itself as speaking for the employing group, an assumption which we are convinced is contrary to fact, particularly in relation to many high type Christian employers; therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the Pittsburgh Ministerial Union, resent this attempt of a commercial organization to prescribe limits within which alone the Church and other organizations may move; that we reaffirm the historic right and the duty of the Church to proclaim the whole truth in Christ as revealed in the Scriptures and as applied under the Holy Spirit to every relationship in life, that we deny to any political, commercial, industrial, or any other group or agency the right to set any restrictions on the freedom of the Christian Church or its agencies to apply the spirit and standards of the Kingdom of God to the whole of life, that we declare it our solemn duty and purpose to defend this liberty of the Gospel."

The clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church also adopted the resolution, so that the Christian forces are lined up in a way which should convince the leaders of the Employers' Association of the impossibility of capital, any more than labor, assuming a position of dictatorship to the Christian Church.

Shipping Board Selected

THE personnel of the United States Shipping Board, which has been causing much worry to President Harding, has been settled at last with the selection of Arthur D. Lasker, of Chicago, as chairman. Mr. Lasker, head of the Lord & Thomas Advertising Agency and part owner of the Chicago National League Baseball Club, was appointed for a term of six years as the representative of the Middle West. He supported Senator Johnson in the pre-convention campaign, in 1912 and in 1916 was a member of the Progressive National Committee, and previously had been active in California politics. The President had sought an experienced shipping man for the position and, failing in that, turned to Mr. Lasker as one of the great business organizers of the country.

Other nominations for the Shipping Board were: T. V. O'Connor, of New York, president of the International Longshoremen's Union, for a term of five years; former Senator George E. Chamberlain, of Oregon, four years; Edward C. Plummer, of Maine, three years; Frederick I. Thompson, of Alabama, two years; Meyer Lissner, of California, one year; Admiral William S. Benson, of Georgia, one year.

As soon as the Senate confirms the nominations, the President expects to hold a conference with the Board regarding its policies. The new Board will try to stop the losses which have been a heavy charge on the public treasury because of the unprecedented stagnation in shipping and to organize a merchant marine on the basic principle of private enterprise operating under federal protection and assistance.

Sims's Speech Under Inquiry

REAR ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS'S habit of expressing his views publicly, with more force than regard for possible enmities, has caused Secretary Denby, of the Naval Department, to cable to him that he had "read with amazement" accounts of a speech by the Admiral in London and to order an immediate report as to whether he had made the remarks attributed to him. The Senate, without a division, adopted a resolution calling for an investigation; and a similar resolution was offered in the House, but not acted on.

Addressing the English-Speaking Union at a luncheon in his honor, the Admiral was quoted as saying of the Sinn Féin and other anti-British propagandists in the United States: "They are like zebras—either black horses with white stripes or white horses with black stripes, but we know they are not horses—they are asses. But each of those asses has a vote, and there are lots of them." He added the advice to the British to disregard any resolution "forced by these jackasses' votes" and the "dangerous prop-

The Moral Demands of Christ

A Sermon by REV. GEORGE JACKSON, D.D.*

TEXT—Luke 6 : 46. "Why call ye Me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

IT IS related of an English king that as he lay upon his deathbed he turned to those who were standing by and said, "Believe me, I have always been a religious man." Yet the man who said this had been during his life the central figure in stories with which no decent writer today would defile his pages. And yet when he came to die, he declared that he had always been "a religious man!"

And unhappily, as every one knows, this strange divorce of religion from morality is no uncommon thing. If it were worth one's while one might gather illustrations of it by the handful both from history and from literature. The truth is we are dealing here with one of the most obstinate and ingrained tendencies of our common human nature. "There is," a great religious teacher has said, "no strange self-deceit more deeply and obstinately fixed in men's hearts than this: that those whom God favors may take liberties that others may not; that religious men venture more safely to transgress than others; that good men may allow themselves to do wrong things." And if anyone is disposed to doubt the truth of this, let him turn, I will not say to books or to the lives of other men, but to his own life; let him examine himself honestly as in the sight of God, and he will soon be ready to admit what a sadly easy thing it is to say "Lord, Lord," while yet we do not the things which He says.

Once more, therefore, let us set ourselves to learn this old and always needed lesson—the obligation of the godly to be good, the worthlessness of all religion in the sight of God which has no root in, and no hold over, the moral life.

AND to begin, let us note with what insistence this truth is proclaimed all through our sacred Scriptures.

Turn to the Old Testament. The glory of the Old Testament is without doubt the teaching of its great prophets and psalmists. And the burden of their teaching, in a word, is this: in God's sight nothing will do but righteousness. Among the nations around Israel—and sometimes within Israel—the emphasis in religion was upon sacrifice. It was only by blood, men thought, the blood of their dearest and their best, of their flocks and of their herds, sometimes even of their sons and of their daughters—only by blood could the Deity be appeased and approached. What a supreme moment in the moral history of our race it was, therefore, when to the old question, "Wherewithal shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God?" this was the answer: "He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but do justly and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." "Thou delightest not in sacrifice; the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit."

And sometimes the prophet's voice grows almost shrill with passion as he thinks how strangely men have misunderstood God and His will concerning them: "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto Me. Your new moons and your appointed feasts My soul hateth; they are a trouble unto Me; I am weary to bear them." What then would God have? This: "Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before Mine eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow." Thus, with all its many voices does the Old Testament tell us—nothing will do but righteousness.

And when we turn to the New Testament the truth grows still more insistent. There we have both what we call "doctrine" and what we call "morality." But what we so often fail to note is the unity in which in the New Testament these two things are set before us. Here there is no such thing as doctrine which does not look towards conduct. Every truth in the world of spiritual reality has its immediate and necessary corollary in the world of moral action. It is never the way of the writers of the New Testament to say: "Here, on the one side are certain things which we must believe; and here, on the other side, are certain other things which we must do." To them these two things, the believing and the doing, are not two, they are one, and are no more to be separated, except of course in thought, than are the two sides of the same coin. So that a religious faith which has not immediate significance for life is not true faith at all. Between faith in God and a life of sin there is a fixed, eternal, inexorable incompatibility.

*Professor of Theology, Didsbury College, Manchester, England.

THERE is perhaps no better way of emphasizing this than by calling to mind the meaning of two or three great and familiar New Testament words. Take, for example, the word faith. "The fruit of the Spirit is . . . faith." When St. Paul says that he means not only what we usually mean by "faith"—he does mean that—he means "faithfulness" as well. Indeed, his word is, if I may so put it, a two-sided word, one side looking heavenward and Godward, the other earthward and manward. So that the "believer" of the New Testament is always not simply a man who trusts, he is a man who can be trusted; he is not simply one who believes in God, he is one in whom other people can believe. And thus it is that the New Testament summons us not only to "believe" the Gospel but to "obey" the Gospel. For the Gospel is both a revelation of divine love and a revelation of divine law; and as we open our hearts to receive the love so we must bow our wills in glad obedience to the law.

Or take the word that on our lips goes so often with the word "faith"—salvation. "Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved." Everyone knows what a sword in the hand of the evangelist that great saying has been. And no one for a moment would wish to quarrel with the evangelist's use of it. But do let us remember, the "saved" man of the New Testament that religion had anything to do with morality. A man then might have said, "I ought to be religious," or he might have said, "I ought to be good"; but nobody ever thought of saying, "I ought to be good because I am religious." Perhaps that is why, as Mr. Lecky has suggested, some of the best men of the ancient world—men like Epictetus and Seneca and Marcus Aurelius—would have nothing to say to Christianity. They were moralists, and in their eyes Christianity was simply another religion of the sort they already knew so well and they passed by on the other side.

Well we have moved far since then but how much has yet to be done before religion—our religion—becomes the moralizing power in life that God means it to be!

Sometimes our religion stops short at emotionalism. I am not denying emotion its just rights: "The fruit of the Spirit is joy." And if a man's religion does nothing for the deepening and enriching of his emotional life, there is surely something amiss with it. But it must find its way into the deeper places of his being if it is to accomplish all God's purpose concerning it. A company of Cornish revivalists, Matthew Arnold once said, will have no difficulty in testing, seeing, hearing and feeling God twenty times over tonight, and yet may be none the better for it tomorrow morning. Cornish revivalism is not quite the poor and barren thing that Arnold thought it, but this at least we may readily grant, that if the quickening of the emotion ends with itself, if we are none the better for it tomorrow morning, it were better never to have known it at all.

And sometimes our religion stops short at ceremonialism. Again, do not let us misunderstand. We are all ceremonialists after a fashion. The fashion of one is gorgeous and elaborate, and him we call a "Ritualist." The fashion of another is simple and plain, and him we call a "Puritan." But the really important thing is not the fashion a man follows, simple or elaborate but rather this—what is it doing for him? What is it helping him to? "Oh, yes," some of us are ready to say, "we are agreed about that; ritualism is nothing." But equally it is true, your want of ritualism is nothing. And he on the one side who prides himself on his ritual, and can never have too much of it, and he on the other side who scorns and flouts it and will have none of it—if they rest there, are both alike in the same condemnation. For the thing that really matters is neither this nor that, neither our ritualism nor our want of it, but "the keeping of the commandments of God." And whatever will best help a man to that, to that let him cleave and therein let him abide. It is not the fashion of our approach when we come saying, "Lord, Lord," to which the Master looks; as Dr. Johnson, used to say, a man who cannot get to heaven in a green coat will not find his way thither the sooner in a grey one. By this will He know that we are His disciples—because we do the things that He says.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"O Day of Rest and Gladness!" or "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Joy in Obedience, Psalm 40, Verses 1 to 8.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 459, first column).

Sermon—"THE MORAL DEMANDS OF CHRIST"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Just as I Am," or "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," or "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud:

O Thou, Eternal and loving, strong in creative power and tender in love to little children, Peacemaker of the world, grant us Thy joy to lighten the sorrows of our hearts, and enough for ourselves and others who bear heavy burdens, remaining with us as we part, and meeting with us when we come again to this hour of worship. In His Name, we ask it. AMEN.

ment is not simply one who has been through some single soul-shattering experience which has made for him all things new, he is one who is daily "being saved" (Acts ii. 47).

Salvation is more than a transaction, sharp and final, once and never again; it is a process, in which the soul is being daily healed of the grievous hurt of its sin in which it is being slowly remade in the divine likeness and image. I repeat the "saved" man of the New Testament is not simply one to whom once a long time ago something happened; he is one in whom something is always happening. Let us read again the apostle's words marking well the tenses as we read: "Bearing fruit in every good work—increasing in the knowledge of God—strengthened with all power unto all patience and long-suffering—giving thanks unto the Father:" this is salvation.

"BUT why," it may be said, "this labored demonstration of what nobody denies? Of course religious men must be good men; of course faith without works is dead. But who does not know these things? Tell us something fresh." But indeed there is no "of course" about it at all. For alas! nothing is easier and nothing is commoner than for religious people to do wrong things; to do them I mean under cover of their religion and as if their religion provided the license for their wrong-doing. "Man should beware," Gladstone once said, "of letting his religion spoil his morality."

It is a terrible thing to think of, but it is sadly, strangely true that there have been times in the history of the world when it would have been better in the interests of morality if religion had not been there at all. In ancient Greece and Rome nobody pretended

I MAY be told, perhaps, that in all that I have said I have been preaching the law rather than the Gospel. In a sense this is true; but it is the law which is implicit in the Gospel, and that flows forth from it. Yet let one word be added from the other side. Christ sends no man forth on a long and lonely quest after righteousness; He turns no man over to the hopeless task of making himself good. If He could do no more for men than that, Christianity would have taken its place centuries ago with other "systems" which began by promising us crowns and ended by leaving us in the mud. God Himself is pledged to our aid in this thing. "This is the will of God, even our sanctification," and if it be our will, too, He and we, working together, will accomplish what of ourselves we never can do.

In one of his stories Ralph Connor tells of a man—a rough "lumberjack" in one of the lumber camps of British Columbia—to whom there happened a great and wonderful thing which made all life for him new. When he told his mates of what had come to him some of them began to jeer. "What!" said one, "have you swallowed the whole thing—Jonah and the rest of it?" This was the simple fellow's answer: "I haven't much of a creed," said he; "don't really know how much I believe. But I do believe that good is good and bad is bad, and good and bad are not the same. And I know a man's a fool to follow the one, and a wise man to follow the other, and," he went on, lowering his voice, "I believe God is at the back of a man who wants to get done with bad."

God is at the back of a man who wants to get done with bad. The saying is very simple, but the very pith of Christ's Gospel is in it, and he that willeth to do His will may know for himself how true it is.

The Sanctuary of the Heart

SUNDAY. I Pet. 3:15. "Sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord." The heart is a sanctuary. It is a place of worship. Worship is always proceeding. There is a large congregation. Who are the worshippers? Let me name a few. There are our wishes, our ambitions, our motives, our willings. All these are worshippers, bowing in the heart before some enthroned and sovereign Lord.

Our dispositions are also among the crowd. All the forces of thought and feeling are mingled in the varied congregation! Go into the sanctuary of any heart, and you will find, kneeling side by side in homage and obeisance, wishes, motives, sentiments, purposes, dispositions, all bowing before some central shrine.

Who is the Lord of the temple? In some temples it is Mammon! He is the sanctified Lord, and round him are kneeling the congregated thoughts, passions and ambitions, offering him incense, supplication and praise. Who is the Lord? In some temples it is the Lord of Misrule. He is sanctified as Lord! Chaos reigns, and in riotous disorder the mob of tumultuous thoughts and feelings offer him noisy acclamation. Who is the Lord of the temples? In some temples Indifference is enthroned. Indifference is sanctified as Lord! The atmosphere is opiated; life is a lounge; everything comes and goes in carelessness; all the worshippers are narcotized in thoughtlessness, or sunk in profound and perilous sleep.

Who is the Lord of the temple? In some temples it is the devil. Every worshipper bends in adoration of vice, reciting the liturgy of uncleanness, and every member of the congregation, every thought, every feeling, every ambition, bears upon its forehead the mark of the beast.

Who is the Lord of the temple? In some temples it is the Christ. All the assembled forces and powers of the life willingly prostrate themselves in fervent and lowly worship. Every hour of the day there is a worshipper in the radiant temple! Now it is a wish, now a shaping plan, now a completed purpose, now a penitent feeling, now a gay delight—these all stoop in reverent homage before the exalted Christ; and as we always appropriate the worth of the object we worship, the bending congregation of thoughts and sentiments acquire the beauty of the Lord. The worshipping motive is chastened and refined; the kneeling wish is etherealized; the stooping sorrow is transfigured; all the reverent forces of the personality are transformed into children of light.

Who is the Lord in the temple? That is the all-determining question. "Sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord." In your temple let the Christ be enthroned. Let everything in the life be made to kneel in that sanctuary. Bring ye everything to the foot of the great white throne. Let the Lord be King! "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

The Clear View of Duty

MONDAY. Acts, 10:6. "He shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do." The word "ought" is one of the greatest in our vocabulary. The man who has learned it is worthy of the degree of Master of Arts. When Jean Valjean escaped from the galleys, he was happy in evading his pursuers until he learned that another man who resembled him had been arrested and was in chains. Then the great problem confronted him. Should he do, at all hazards, what he knew he ought to do? Should he give himself up and return to the intolerable anguish of the old, weary days? He decided otherwise; and "just there," says Hugo, "he heard an internal burst of laughter!" All joy forsook him; conscience awoke and shook its finger at him; the comfort of living was gone. He had broken the law marked out for him as a child of God.

At length, the burden passing all endurance, he resolved to confess his identity and take the consequences. And "just there" was where he saw "the great light shining," which was, indeed, the shining of the face of God.

Comrades of the Master

TUESDAY. Phil. 4:3. "Fellow laborers, whose names are in the book of life," Paul writes of "fellow laborers" and "yokefellows." He is appreciative of comradeship and fellowship in his daily work. He knows the value of kindred spirits and sympathetic friends. Jesus is the great fellow laborer and yokefellow and inspiring companion. He bids us go with Him on His great errand of redemption.

Such comradeship is important in its effect on character. Adam Smith was not only a political economist, but he also wrote much about character. He taught that it is well for us all to imagine ourselves in the presence of an "ideal spectator." This "ideal spectator," or "man within the breast," would counteract the evil influence of unworthy companions and the frivolous blame of the unthinking. When we are in the presence of nobler persons, our nobler selves are free and strong; while in the presence of the base, we are often ashamed even of our higher feelings. Who is not good and noble in the presence of some highly respected man or woman? Character is caught, not taught. Our characters are a transcript of our ideals. We work out inevitably in things about us the likeness of that with which we come in contact. In medieval times the knight never started out to his work until he first had made a pilgrimage to some chapel. There he knelt before the altar, in the sight of the Saviour's face, and spent hours searching his life.

But character is not only made by seeing what is good and criticizing what is bad. It goes beyond the initial stage of fine ideals and high standards of thought. Character also needs action for its growth and development. He is a true king who does kingly deeds. He is a true Christian who is most like Christ in deeds.

It is here that the comradeship of the Master helps us. Comradeship means that we engage in the same task, engage in the same work, take up the same burdens, labor for the same ends. Men become comrades when they fight side by side, stand shoulder to shoulder. Jesus Christ is bent on a great mission. We are His comrades when we occupy ourselves with that mission. To be a comrade of Jesus Christ, we must "seek first the Kingdom of God," and with life and lip give impetus to its values. Therefore let us get into the apostolic walk and join the procession of the Greathearts and Stronghearts, and go forth led by our Great Captain and capture this sin-struck world for Him, and by so doing regenerate lives and transform environments.

"Galahad, knight who perished, awaken again
And teach us immaculate ways among men."
R. B.

The Christian as a Lamp

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 5:14. "Ye are the light of the world." Light, the first act of creation, is a revealer, a witness of all other creative glories. There was light because God was there. Every good and perfect gift cometh from the Father of light. We may become bright and shining lights after Him, reflecting His beauty to men like the sun and stars, till the whole earth is full of His glory.

When God's spiritual light is flashed upon the soul, we become responsible for the illumination of the world; to smother its shining means night to men. If we seek to shine our own light, we stand between God and men as shadows, and those seeking after God will cry as Diogenes did to Alexander, "Stand out of my sunshine."

It is the property of light to shine. We need only to let it shine, like the stars, without effort. Hiding the jewel rays in a napkin prevents our becoming a lighthouse to earth's mariners. We should be like John the Baptist, drawing the curtains of darkness from the form of Christ, crying, "Behold the Lamb of God Who taketh away the sins of the world."

Cheerfulness is light, benevolence, a pure ray, joy, winsome love, bright and beautiful. We are to let these rays gleam forth upon the world that men may see the light of life so that at evening time it shall be light, and after the momentary eclipse of death, light forevermore!

Grace for Peculiar Need

THURSDAY. II Cor. 12:9. "My grace is sufficient for thee—for my strength is made perfect (manifest) in (your) weakness." Grace sufficient for what? For the ordeal of suffering unaccompanied by bitterness, or whining, or cynical complaints. It is fruitless to inquire what Paul's thorn in the flesh was. It may have been bad eye-sight. Whatever it was it was a physical handicap. No doubt he believed he could do much better work for Christ if it were removed. But nearly all men have to work under some physical handicap; or, what is as bad, something that they consider as one. It may be what they consider a lack of opportunity or some inherited weakness, or some real physical defect. When we feel that nature has been unkind to us it takes a lot of grace to keep a sweet and brave optimism alive within the breast. That grace can be made manifest in strength and courage given us beyond our own. Grace is an extension of unmerited and unlooked-for kindness. Without strength of character, men are unable to stand up under adversity. They cannot stand the slightest irritation.

The history of all heroic exploits teaches us that it is rigor that makes vigor and that success is more apt to come from adversity than from prosperity. Those who are the most kindly, sympathetic and eager to serve are not usually persons whose skies have been cloudless and whose eyes have been free from tears. They are rather those who have been down in the deepest valley of human suffering.

If we think our woes and trials are peculiar, we should remember that grace is peculiar too. God never manifests the same sort of grace to two different persons. As the incoming tide shapes itself to conform to every indentation of every separate cove in the bay, so divine grace shapes itself to your peculiar and personal need. At every turn in the dark road we see the light ahead.

Wisdom in Silence

FRIDAY. James 3:3. "Bits in the horses' mouths." Paul says that when he was caught up into Paradise, he heard "unspeakable words" and saw things "not lawful for a man to utter." What does he mean? What "law" was it that hindered him?

Was it an interdict which God had laid upon him? Had he been enjoined from speaking, like Peter the Martyr, who is always represented with his fingers on his lips? Or was it the boundaries of speech that gave him pause? There are indeed many things in our experience for which there are no words in our vocabulary. For example, you will search the dictionary in vain for the wherewithal to express a mother's love. So there are "songs without words." Did you never look out over a far-reaching landscape which baffled the largest possibilities of speech? Who has ever adequately described a storm at sea; or the beauty of a sunset; or the solemnity of a death-bed?

"I wonder if ever a song was sung but the singer's heart sang sweeter?"

I wonder if ever a hymn was rung but the theme surpassed the meter?

I wonder if ever a sculptor wrought

Till the cold stone echoed his ardent thought;

Or if ever a painter with light and shade

The dream of his inmost soul portrayed?"

Or perhaps the restraint of expediency was laid upon Paul. It is not always wise to tell all one knows. This is the lesson of that homely fable of Aesop, where he tells of a lion calling a sheep and asking, "Is my breath sweet?" and when the sheep answered "No," he bit off his head for slander. He then called a wolf and asked, "Is my breath sweet?" and when the wolf answered "Yes," he bit off his head for flattery. He then called a fox and asked, "Is my breath sweet?" And the fox, coughing and sneezing said, "I have such a cold that I really cannot say"; whereupon the lion said, "Come with me; thou art the wise one!"

We talk too much; or, if not that, we all say too much that had better be left unsaid, and withhold too much of what might profitably be said to those about us. "Silence is golden."

Deeds Better Than Words

SATURDAY. John 16:31. "Do ye now believe?" The disciples had just made a beautiful confession of faith: "Now, are we sure—by this we believe!" But Jesus knows how easy it is to utter words in the atmosphere of the prayer meeting, which one is not prepared to stand for on the morrow, and He presses the inquiry as to the genuineness of their faith. "You speak after this fashion—do you know what such language ought to mean? Is your loyalty equal to the severe strain that is certainly at hand?"

It is always in order to ask searching questions of those who recite glibly long creeds. Stout affirmations are easily pronounced, but their implications are not clearly perceived. Once a man said: "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." Did Jesus congratulate him on his complete surrender? No! He began to tell him what it would mean. It is one thing to sing "Anywhere with Jesus I can safely go"; it is better to sing "I'll go where He wants me to go," provided we have some sense of direction.

The world is tired of recitations. What is needed is performance. Stop your mouth, until your hands and feet are within hearing distance and ready to take orders. The forces of evil are not afraid of orthodoxy of speech but of action. If dogmas have fallen into disrepute, it is because they are not capable of a direct relationship to daily conduct, and those who hold them are not in themselves the most attractive examples of Christlikeness. Those who claim perfection totally misunderstand the use of language. In the same breath with our expression of sincere faith, belongs the prayer "Help Thou my unbelief," wherein we become aware of the inadequacy of our present convictions.

HEBE

Rich and delicious desserts made economically with HEBE

One of the many excellent uses for HEBE is in making desserts. Puddings, custards, cream pies, and pudding sauces made with HEBE are economical and nutritious as well as deliciously flavored.

The thrifty housewife uses HEBE not only in desserts but in nearly everything she cooks or bakes. It is a remarkable aid in improving the table because it gives the foods a fine flavor and also adds food value.

HEBE is pure skimmed milk evaporated to double strength enriched with cocoanut fat—a wholesome, nutritious, well-balanced food product. For real economy, order several cans from your grocer and use it daily. Send for the free HEBE book of recipes for suggestions. Address 3806 Consumers Bldg., Chicago.

The Early Life of Saul

International Sunday-School Lesson for July 3
Acts 21:39; 22:3, 28; II Tim. 3:14, 15; Deut. 6:4-9

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

THE study of history is generally the study of biography. Events center about the lives of individuals. Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, will be the subject of our studies for the remainder of the year. While not one of the Twelve Apostles his recorded work is greater than that of any who were companions with Jesus. Every member of the Bible School knows many things about this great bond-servant of Jesus Christ, who was converted near Damascus. By a careful study during the coming six months, we can know Paul better and learn many things from him by means of which we can become better apostles for our Lord.

July 3 will be observed in many parts of the country as "Citizenship Sunday." This is by request of the United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Naturalization. This Sunday is chosen by reason of its nearness to Independence Day. This lesson, which deals with the early life of Saul, lends itself to applications with reference to preparation for citizenship. Saul was a most worthy Roman citizen, and Tarsus never had a son who brought more credit to that city. The name of the chief political officer of a city can be almost forgotten ten years after he ceases to hold office, but the world still knows Saul of Tarsus.

Occasionally a man is converted after he is thirty years of age. Generally this change of heart comes before he is twenty or it never takes place. The child is still the father of the man. The events of the early years determine the general trend of life. The early life of Saul explains many of the later events. Foundational study must come before the 'teen age is over. Post-graduate courses may come later, as was the case with Paul, who began to learn from Jesus Christ when on the Damascus road.

The verses selected for this first study introduce Saul to us. He was a Jew of Tarsus, and also a Roman citizen. Like Timothy, he had been instructed in the Law, the Prophets and the other Writings of the Old Testament in the home. From earliest years these had been his daily readings. Many selected passages had been committed to memory. He was a regular worshiper at the local synagogue. He was a Pharisee, as will be seen in the study of the lesson for next week. Having been instructed with reference to the Law, he was zealous to even force people to think with him and was not afraid to use force to accomplish his purpose.

TEACHING is a rare privilege. The words of today are seeds which bear fruit in after years. The character of a teacher often impresses even more than the facts which are taught. Teachers are remembered though they may have no personal evidence thereof. Saul had the opportunity of going to Jerusalem for post-graduate study and there sat at the feet of Gamaliel, a great Pharisee and profound philosopher of that day. The careful mental training of these preparatory years is seen in the great addresses and numerous writings of Paul. The facts of Christianity, later acquired, were presented with the logic and rhetoric of academic days. He was able to use Greek, Latin, Hebrew and Aramaic, but best of all he could think with God, under the power of the Holy Spirit. A study of these preparatory years show that Saul was sincere and conscientious. Later, we will see that one can be both and yet be in the wrong.

Again we have Deut. 6:4-9 as a part of the lesson text. In connection with the study for May 1 this passage was considered. Every male Hebrew repeated this and other scripture portions twice daily. The words were placed in the phylacteries, worn on the forehead and the left arm, and in the mezuzah, which was fastened to the doorposts of the Jewish homes.

Like all Jewish lads, Saul was taught a trade. He was a tent-maker and was so expert in weaving the hair of the Cilician goats that when away from home he could earn his own living that he might preach the gospel without charge. There is still dignity in labor. The World War revealed unthought-of individual resources and many are still spending themselves in helping humanity.

Saul, named after the great Benjamite king, or Paul, according to the Latin, was proud of his birth, his attainments and his privileges. It is very interesting to observe those two Roman citizens talking things over in the Castle of Antonio, Jerusalem. Paul had been bound for flogging. Knowing just how things would turn out, he could smile contentedly while the soldiers were tying him to the whipping-post, and even when laying his back bare. Then he just asked if this was the way they treated a Roman citizen who had not had a formal trial. Hastily they summoned Claudius Lysias, the Chief Captain. With much display, and possibly with a manifestation of arrogance, he declared that his Roman citizenship had cost him a great sum of money. Whereupon Paul stated with much directness, "But I am a Roman born." That day, at least, Paul's back did not receive the forty stripes, save one. Lysias was terrified, for a serious offence had all but been committed.

TO OBTAIN the most from this series of lessons, there must be continuous study and research. Suggestions will be made in the various lesson studies. To know Paul and his writings is a worthwhile work. Classes will be stimulated if home work is assigned, but be very particular to call for that work on the following Sunday. Note that in connection with the Acts you should also know the epistles of Paul. He penned more books than any of the eight New Testament authors. In preparation for the coming Sunday, and as a preview for the six months, read Acts during the next week. You will note that there are twenty-eight chapters. Have each member of the class read just four chapters each day. If asked to make an analysis of the book it will cause more careful reading. These analyses can be compared and a workable one agreed upon. Write this simple outline at the beginning of Acts. All blank space in a Bible, the margins, etc., is fine for notes. Special attention will be given to the geography of the journeys of Paul when they are reached in our studies. We now have six months of delightful study and research ahead of us. If teachers, seek to inspire your class with that fact. You can make them enthusiastic students. Do not let the summer lessen the interest. Remind them that summer is the time for Daily Vacation Bible Schools, Summer Schools for Bible Study, etc.

Books that help in Bible study should be purchased every year. There are small-sized but very helpful volumes that you should possess for use in knowing Paul better. Some are "Bible Studies in the Life of Paul," H. T. Sells; "The Man Paul," Robert E. Speer; Stalker's "Life of Paul." The five pages on "The Acts" and "The Pauline Epistles" in Tarbell's Teachers' Guide are unusually helpful. A long list of books as well as a "Chronology on Paul's Life" will be found in Peloubet's "Select Notes." Closer attention should be given to the study of the Bible than of any other book. Superficial reading covering a life time furnishes little real information. We must know the Bible, for it is the book by which we are to live.

Saul was born about the same year as Jesus. Both had world missions. You cannot be either, but remember what Jesus said to Peter: "What is that to thee? follow thou me." Would that we could follow Him as well as Paul did!

Which of these two men has learned the secret of fifteen minutes a day?

The secret is contained in the free book offered below. Until you have read it you have no idea how much 15 minutes a day can mean in growth and success. Send for your copy now

HERE are two men, equally good-looking, equally well-dressed. You see such men at every social gathering. One of them can talk of nothing beyond the mere day's news. The other brings to every subject a wealth of side-light and illustration that makes him listened to eagerly.

He talks like a man who had traveled widely, though his only travels are a business man's trips. He knows something of history and biography, of the work of great scientists, and the writings of philosophers, poets, and dramatists.

Yet he is busy, as all men are, in the affairs of every day. How has he found time to acquire so rich a mental background? When there is such a multitude of books to read, how can any man be well-read?

The answer to this man's success—and to the success of thousands of men and women like him—is contained in a free book that you may have for the asking. In it is told the story of Dr. Eliot's great discovery, which, as one man expressed it, "does for reading what the invention of the telegraph did for communication." From his life-time of reading, study, and teaching, forty years of it as President of Harvard University, Dr. Eliot tells just what few books he chose for the most famous library in the world; why he chose them and how he has arranged them with notes and reading courses so that any man can get from them the essentials of a liberal education in even fifteen minutes a day.

The booklet gives the plan, scope, and purpose of

HEART STORIES

A NEW BOOK OF SEVEN STORIES

By Dr. Charles M. Sheldon
author of "IN HIS STEPS"

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled, 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the "Good Fight," who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold in "As Heaven Views It," whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in "Why the Minister Remained"; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in "Of Such Is the Kingdom" and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; "Sunrise on the Mesa" is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; "His Christmas Gift" is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled "Guests of Honor," in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, "In His Steps," should read this new book.

aganda circulated in America by your enemies and ours."

He also was quoted as making this prophecy: "The English-speaking peoples are coming together in the bonds of comradeship, and they are going to run this round globe. I should like to see an inter-English-speaking policy and when we have that we shall have peace and prosperity."

Secretary Denby's action followed a call by Senator McCormick of Illinois to protest against the Admiral's utterances and to ask for disciplinary action. It recalled his famous "blood is thicker than water" speech of 1910 in the Guild Hall in London, for which he was reprimanded by President Taft, and his criticisms, of the naval medal of honor awards, which precipitated heated discussions.

British Push Back Poles

BRITISH forces, ready to fight if opposition is offered, have been conducting a "big push" against the Polish lines in Upper Silesia in an effort to bring the province once more under the control of the Inter-Allied Commission. So far the Poles have offered only the merest show of resistance and the British, in a fanwise movement toward the large cities near the Polish border, have occupied Gleiwitz, about fifty miles southeast of Oppeln, and Rosenberg, a considerable distance to the northeast of Oppeln, the headquarters of the Inter-Allied Commission.

The British, while pushing back the Polish invaders, have prevented the German irregular forces from advancing and thus are creating a neutral zone which lessens the danger of a revival of warfare. British troops from the Rhine have been sent to Silesia, but even with these reinforcements the Allied forces will be so weak that the utmost care will be necessary to keep the Germans and Poles under control. Sir Harold Stuart, the new British Plebiscite Commissioner, indicated that a new plan of pacification was being formulated for submission to the Allied Supreme Council and that, with its approval, the work of clearing away the Silesian menace to Europe's peace would be advanced.

AMERICAN LEGION HEAD KILLED IN ACCIDENT. F. W. Galbraith, Jr., national commander of the American Legion, was killed when an automobile in which he was riding plunged over a steep embankment near Indianapolis. Mr. Galbraith, whose home was in Cincinnati, was colonel of the old First Regiment, Ohio National Guard, which was mustered into the Federal Service as the 147th Regiment, and commanded it with distinction in the battles of St. Mihiel and the Argonne. He was chosen last September to head the American Legion.

ULSTER PARLIAMENT BEGINS WORK. The first meeting of the Northern Parliament of Ireland, marking a new development in the government of the island, took place quietly and without a hitch in the Council Chamber of the Belfast City Hall. Only the forty Unionist members, of whom two are women, were present, the dozen Sinn Feiners and Nationalists elected to seats absenting themselves. Robert William Hugh O'Neill, the youngest member of the House, was elected Speaker. The Premier, Sir James Craig, was the first member of the new government to take the oath.

REPUBLICANS REDUCE SOUTH'S QUOTA. The Republican National Committee, at its meeting in Washington, ordered a further reduction of twenty-three votes in the representation of the Southern states in the party's national convention. The delegates which the South loses, making a total reduction of 40 per cent. since 1912, will be gained largely by Northwestern states. John T. Adams, of Iowa, succeeded Will H. Hays as national chairman.

FOUNDER OF ASBURY PARK DIES. James A. Bradley, who founded the New Jersey resorts of Asbury Park, Ocean Grove and Bradley Beach, where famous religious gatherings are held each summer, died at his home in New York City at the age of 91. A celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Asbury Park had been planned for this month.

THOMPSON'S JUDICIAL TICKET DEFEATED IN CHICAGO. Mayor William Hale Thompson's political machine suffered a severe defeat in Chicago when its candidates for twenty judges of the Circuit Court of Cook County and one judge of the Superior Court were defeated by a coalition ticket supported by Democrats and insurgent Republicans.

CHURCH UNION ADVANCED IN CANADA. Organic union of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches in Canada has been approved by the Congregational Union of Canada, in session at Montreal, and by the Presbyterian Assembly, meeting at Toronto.

CIGARETTES NOW BANNED IN UTAH. An anti-cigarette law, which prohibits the sale, exchange or giving away of cigarettes and provides against smoking in public places, has become effective in Utah. The measure was passed at the last legislative session.

Thy Will Be Done—With My Strength

B. Y. P. U. and C. E. Matt. 6:7-15

WE OWE it to God, the world, the Kingdom, to be strong in mind, body and soul. Red-blooded, virile men and women are needed for the Herculean tasks that challenge in these days of social rebuilding and moral reconstruction. In the army of the Christian faith it takes all of a person all of the time to do all the things that demand to be done for the bringing in of a new and better day for the human race. God wants our all—our minds to think for Him and to plan for the Kingdom; our hands to do deeds for Him and our feet to run errands for Him.

If you will study the lives of the great representatives of the Kingdom you will learn that they took care of and trained their bodies for hard usage on the difficult fields of action and the strenuous energetics of their environments. We cannot imagine a Grenfell facing the rigors of the Labrador coast, an Archdeacon Stuck on the wintry trails of Alaska, a Dan Crawford in the fever swamps of Africa, a Frank Higgins in the lumber-camps doing acceptable and efficient work with bodies weakened or incapacitated for their mission.

John Williams trained as a blacksmith and so equipped himself to endure hardness as a good soldier of the Cross in the South Seas. Keith Falconer was an enthusiastic cyclist in England before he served as an enthusiastic apostle in Arabia. Charley Studd and Stanley Smith labored hard at cricket and rowing while in college before they labored hard at preaching and teaching in China.

It is a heartening sign of the times that more and more are stressing the "passing of indoors" and are advocating the virtues of the "old swimmin' hole" and the field sports of the day, summer and winter. The more baseball diamonds, football ovals, tennis courts and skating rinks we have the stronger and healthier shall be our rising generation. The gymnasium shirt is as much of an adjunct as the Geneva gown. The khaki of the hiker leads to the degree hood of the scholar. The aromatic and resinous odors of the forest and the smell of the burning sap of the campfire are more of an asset than the fetid and stuffy interiors of the study. The pulpit of the Master Preacher was a tossing boat on the crest of the wave and the picturesque background of a harvest field. The wind-swept ridges and arid wastes and cactus growths of the desert and wilderness were the training places of ancient prophet and seer. The Boy and Girl Scouts of today are the timber for the missionary and pathfinder of tomorrow.

But it is only strength intelligently and conscientiously used that will be acceptable. Milton asks, "What is strength without a double share of wisdom?" Use wisdom in acquiring strength. Use wisdom in applying strength. Strength dedicated to God and employed in the help of humanity nets results like unto the strength of ten. "To be strong is to be happy," says Longfellow in "Christus-Golden Legend"—but the poet is speaking in terms of strength used for the Master.

Thy Kingdom Come—In the World

WHAT can I do to make the Kingdom come in the world? I can study world needs. I can know not only the needs but I can put myself into a sympathetic attitude toward those who have need. I can put myself into the place of others, see their viewpoint, try to imagine myself in the other's place. Thus will I be able to move toward the lessening of the evils of which I know. I can move others by teaching and preaching and by prayer and with my purse. I can move my time and my talents, dedicate them to this noble use and purpose and propaganda.

It is said that when Andrew Fuller went into his native town to collect for missions an old acquaintance said, "Well Andrew, I'll give you five pounds, seeing it is you." "No," said Mr. Fuller, "I cannot take anything for this cause, seeing it is me." He handed the money back to his friend. The man saw the point. "Andrew, you are right," he said, "here are ten pounds, seeing it is for Jesus Christ."

When we learn that "going into all the world to preach the gospel" is Jesus Christ's work and command we shall have no difficulty of winning the world for Him. Once get this idea fixed, that it is the Lord's work and command, we shall move ourselves, our friends, heaven and earth to make it successful.

Jimmy Gives a Lift

plunge sent them out of range of the light. Who could say whether a soul aboard was able to make fast the line?

UPON the ledge, the two watchers felt the tension of the rescuers as they stood by the breeches buoy, waiting—waiting—waiting for the tautening or the sagging of that line.

A shout went up! The line had held fast! The crew bent the hawser to the whip-line and began to haul. Steady, through the caldron of boiling wreckage, cool heads and hardy hands kept the lines from tangling—for a while. . . . Then, down crashed the foremast, and a man dropped from the shrouds into the sea. In jumped one of the belted, white-clad figures from the shore, and two heads were thrust up in the midst of the debris.

Then the light went out.

Mr. Brightman pressed his hand across his eyes, muttering protest, shaken with the horror of his own helplessness, but powerless against the compelling urge to see the end.

The reflector, shining again, revealed a sailor, who swung himself on a hawser and began to make his way shoreward, hand over hand, with the ship pitching and tautening the rope at every off-shore lurch, until a sudden wave, broad-side, flung him into the air like a dead fly off a rubber band, and he came down, headlong, into the seething wreckage.

A dripping form rose out of a great roller, dragged his rescued burden to the sand, and turned to the ear-splitting fall of the vessel's mainmast that swirled inshore, its broken arm sweeping spars and timbers and tangled lines—oh, the hopelessly tangled lines—on with it to destruction.

The straining eyes above the ledges spied out four huddled heaps on the cabin top which had drifted loose and was within fifty feet of a huge, flat rock. The surfmen had seen them, too, and they made a dash for this rock, which was the only point of possible service, heaving-line in hand. The Keeper shouted orders as the shipwrecked group made fast the line around the body of one of its members who, at a second command, jumped into the sea and was steadily pulled toward safety.

At the same moment, another figure plunged in after the first, as if afraid to trust it to the slender line; but the undertow swept him back, doubled on its own force and flung him shoreward again, catching him up once more for another backward surge, when two of the life-savers jumped after him just in time.

One of the Coast Guard crew was working over the first man saved, farther up the beach, and that left only two on the rock to haul the heaving-line; but nearer and nearer came their burden, and thankfully they lifted it, when a gigantic breaker thundered in upon them, washing rescued and rescuers from the rock, but up, inshore, raking the ragged tops of twenty-odd feet of low-lying ledges.

THE backward drag of the undertow threatened them savagely, when, with a single movement, Mr. Brightman and Jimmy slid down the surface of the ledge on which they stood, and seized the man who still clung to the rescued one. The other surfman was drawn back, but regained his footing on the way and gripped the rock that stood between him and certain death.

Under that same rock of thirteen tons or more, may still be seen a great spar wedged there when the shock of that terrific impact of water lifted it for one desperate second in the worst storm that ever shook the shores of Merry's Point.

From this stronghold, the life-saver took off the two survivors and made his way with them to the beach where the two civilians were giving a hand with the limp body they had helped to save.

Jameson Brightman was eagerly obeying the shouted directions of the coast-guard and the hotel bell-boy, who proceeded to put into practice all his absorbed knowledge of resuscitation. Unrolling a clinging garment, as they turned the drenched form over, the Congressman found himself holding a baby, cold and still.

"It is the woman who screamed!" he half sobbed, "and her child!"

The baby was not dead, and the mother opened frantic eyes after nearly twenty minutes of the most wonderful treatment Jameson Brightman had ever witnessed—rolling her over, a bundled wedge beneath the stomach; now turning her back, her tongue held firmly between rough fingers suddenly grown gentle, while Jimmy skilfully raised and lowered the bleeding arms. Mr. Brightman, himself, rubbed the lower limbs upward, always upward toward the heart, and the hard-minded man felt the unguessed thrill of giving life. Life! To those who must else have remained dead!

As the two "outsiders" followed the procession of saviours and the saved to the almost holy shelter of the Coast Guard Station, the famous legislator bowed his head in an overwhelming humility of thanksgiving.

"What is my life worth beside these guardians of God's children?" he silently bemoaned; then he straightened with a recurring sense of his old power and authority. His head was high, again, as he placed the mother between warmed blankets on a couch.

The Congressman crossed the room to the Keeper's desk, and wrote rapidly. He turned at once to Jimmy, who was holding the baby in a close, frightened grip.

"Give me the baby, Jim, old chap," he commanded, "and take this message to the nearest telegraph station, on the run. Good way to work off some of this excitement. Read it, if you like."

Jimmy stared. "Read—your telegram?"

"Yes. Read it! I wish you to do so." The Congressman's set mouth relaxed into a wistful smile as he watched the boy's changing face, which was suddenly raised, transfigured by radiant astonishment.

"Will you take it?" Mr. Brightman asked him.

"Will I take it?" Jimmy stretched out a cold, wet hand, and wrung the palm that met his own. "I sure will!"

DOWN in Washington, the lobby of the Congress Hall Hotel resounded to the monotonous cry of "Roll call in de house! Roll call in de house!" when a high-pitched summons for "Misto' Bly!" rose above it, sharply. Congressman Bly turned wearily, in the doorway.

"Fo' de Intahstate Committee, Misto' Bly. De boss, he reckon mos' likely you-all take it, sah."

Mr. Bly unfolded the yellow sheet. He read:

"Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Washington, D. C.

"PUSH BLY BILL FOR COAST GUARD. MEASURE HAS MY SUPPORT.

(Signed) JAMESON BRIGHTMAN."

"You'll take it, sah?"

"Take it?" cried the Congressman. He raised the fluttering sheet high. "I sure will!"

AT A meeting of the Industrial Christian Alliance, recently held in New York City, a loving cup was presented to Charles W. Knight, as a mark of esteem from his associates on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of his appointment as general manager for the organization. In this testimonial all united heartily. Addresses were made in which Mr. Knight's ten years of faithful service as general manager, without remuneration, and the wonderful work he had accomplished, were enthusiastically acknowledged.

The officers of the Industrial Alliance are: George T. Brokaw, President; Hamilton Fish, Jr., First Vice-President; John A. Offord, Second Vice-President; Benjamin H. Doane, Secretary; Charles W. Knight, Assistant Secretary and General Manager; Bruce M. Falconer, Treasurer; Theodosius Stevens, Counsel; Edwin Zimmerman, Medical Supervisor. Many prominent men are members.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices. Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent., are described in Circular 28.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Questions and Answers

SUBSCRIBER, Glendale, W. Va., writes: "I have noticed that those who go to prayer meetings are generally the staunch spiritual supporters of the Church, and one can see that they do receive a blessing. Prayer meetings are mostly made up of the female sex. Twenty-five per cent. men is about the average. Why are the men not as much interested as the women? One time we had all a special invitation for a prayer meeting, and the above percentage held good. Shortly after that, the men members of our church were asked to meet, as there was an urgent business matter that needed the advice and financial support of the business men of our church. A large percentage of our male members turned out, and I think that none of the business men were missing. The reason that there are more women than men at the prayer meetings is because the women have practically all the organizations of the church—like the Ladies' Aid Society, Home and Foreign Missionary Society, the Industrial Society—and through these different departments they receive a clearer view and vision of what the church does and is expected to do, and also a better appreciation of the necessity and pleasure it gives to work for the Lord. The men, we may just as well admit, have in most churches no society or club like those the women have, where they may get together to discuss the duties of the church as a whole and how to build up the Kingdom. There are in some churches good Men's Bible classes; but until men get together in church organizations to discuss different needs and use their business-trained minds for the upbuilding of God's Kingdom prayer meetings will hardly see more than the average 20 or 25 per cent. of men."

It is quite true that in many churches the situation is such as this letter outlines. We would be glad to hear from churches in which this inequality has been overcome, where the prayer meetings now have a fair representation of both sexes, and how the change came about.

A Michigan Pastor sends this interesting note: "In communities without churches, Sunday schools and all other Christian organizations, we find always the dance occupying a first place in the people's lives. A certain number of the people in such communities call themselves Christians. The dance question is brought into conversation. The question is asked: 'Is it wrong to dance? The Bible does not forbid it. Is it well? David danced, too!' Lately we were holding revival meetings in an unchurched location, in order to win some to Christ and to strengthen our Sunday school. One evening we found only a few people in our service. We knew a dance would be given that same night. Four of us planned to visit the dance-hall. We paid for tickets of admission and went in. The looks of the people told us already that they understood that a minister of the Gospel and a dance-hall did not belong together. We waited a few minutes, the music stopped, and the dancers sat down to rest awhile. It occurred to us that when people could be Christians and dance at the same time, there could be no reason why we should not entertain them during this rest-period with a Gospel hymn. We started a hymn and as soon as we saw that the orchestra made themselves ready again, we stopped our singing, and the dance was continued. While we were waiting for the next rest period, the dance manager requested that we should leave the hall. If we continued the singing of Gospel songs, he said, probably it would do harm to his dance entertainments, as people do not wish to attend a dance where Gospel songs are sung. We asked for his request in writing and he gave us the following: 'This to certify that the missionaries have been requested to refrain from singing at the dance, as per information from the authorities of community.'"

J. G. F., Waverly, Ill. Periods of spiritual doubt and depression are the work of the adversary of souls. But take courage, and pray for faith. Temptation is not sin, for all are subject to it; but to yield to it is sin, when, through prayer, we can be strengthened to resist. Remember the promises. It is not His desire that any should perish. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow." "Whosoever will, may come." "Whosoever cometh, He will in no wise cast out." Pray in Jesus' name for strength and courage, and for greater faith. The Prayer League is pleading for you, that you may be helped through your severe trials, and given heart peace and assurance.

Mrs. H. C. K., Lancaster, O., writes: "A leading minister made the statement from the pulpit that a Christian of the present time is head and shoulders above the angels in heaven in the sight of God. Is the statement justified in Scripture?"

See Heb. 2:6, 7; Psa. 8:5, I Cor. 6:3; Luke 20:36. The minister in question may not have been rightly understood.

B. N., Guthrie, Okla. There is no real conflict between the passages in Matt. 22:30 and Luke 20:34, 35. The sense obviously meant to be conveyed is thus stated by the best commentators: Marriage is ordained to perpetuate the human family; but as there will be no breaches by death in the future state, this ordinance will cease. We have heard of the strained interpretation of Luke's Gospel before, but authorities give it no consideration. We might point to Christ's own language as all that is needed for complete contradiction of the assertion that Luke's meaning is that those who marry while on earth are excluded from heaven. See Matt. 8:11, which refers to the patriarchs, all of whom were married. See also Mark 12:19 to 25. In the state of the redeemed, the natural body will have given way to a spiritual body (I Cor. 15:44).

Interested Reader, Sunbury, O. The looseness of the existing laws in the United States regarding divorce and remarriage is a great evil. They are largely in conflict with plain Bible teaching on the subject; indeed they seem to ignore it altogether.

Rev. W. H. Hargrove, Versailles, Mo., writes: "I have just finished reading your editorial, 'The Big Brother and the League,' in the Christian Herald. Your idea, reduced to practical application, is to let the other nations go ahead and assume all the obligations, responsibilities, and expenses of the League of Nations in carrying out the noble service to humanity, and America come along and rake in the benefits, for the impossibility of being a 'Big Brother' is certainly apparent, at least under present conditions, because the President of the United States takes every advantage on every occasion to declare the League dead, and that this country can never enter into it. These times call for Elijahs, Jeremiahs, John the Baptists, real prophets of God, not men who cover over national selfishness with beautiful words of impossible fulfillment. Shall Christianity adapt itself to majorities in politics or politics be made to adhere to Christian principles? This is to my mind the great issue at the present time. Before we boast further in the matter of our spiritual supremacy over the rest of the world, let us remember that the old world adopted the Covenant of Peace, the League of Nations, while America rejected it."

We believe it to be one of the inevitable things that our nation must do its full part in world readjustment. It is not necessary to be a prophet to foresee that this will yet be done, and that America, notwithstanding delays, will be represented in all that makes for world peace and reduction of armaments. This can be accomplished without unnecessary involvements, and yet so that the nation's honor and good faith are preserved. In view of present conditions, it would be well to await developments before hurrying to conclusions.

J. J. M., Newark, N. J. Now that the war is over, all feelings of bitterness between the nations may be expected to gradually pass away, as they should. National antagonisms sometimes die out quickly, especially if both sides are magnanimous and forgiving.

The Richest Man in Kansas

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON

1 vol., ornamental binding, large type

Dr. Sheldon, the editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald, has written a strong dramatic story in "The Richest Man in Kansas."

How would you feel and act if you were suddenly to be told that you had come into a big fortune overnight? This is what happened to Anson Howard, whose remarkable experience Dr. Sheldon relates in this new story. From an income of $125 a month to cutting coupons on $10,000,000 worth of gilt-edge securities is a change so radical that it would turn most men's heads—to say nothing of their wives' and daughters'. Just what happened is vividly told in Dr. Sheldon's dramatic presentation. At no time is there a stronger test of character than when Fortune knocks at the door. Some lose their bearing altogether. Read the book and see how Anson Howard and his folks stood the test.

Dr. Sheldon's books have sold the world over to the extent of many millions of copies. We believe that his latest work, "The Richest Man in Kansas," will prove immensely popular. It is intensely interesting and dramatic and gives a great lesson to all of us. It will make you pause and think. A book that does that is worth while.

Heart Stories

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON

1 vol., cloth binding, large type

Margaret Sangster says:

"When the name of Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald, is printed on the cover of a book, the reader is assured of good, solid, literary ability, of a sunny sense of humor, and of more than a bit of inspiration. The name of Charles M. Sheldon is associated throughout the country with the things that make life worth while—with ideals, and truth, and dreams of home, and the kind of religion that folk really live. There are stories of college and of affairs of state; of the trials of a young minister and of the struggles of business men. There are stories in which youth fights the good fight, there are stories of near failure, and there are stories of love. And all of them are written in Dr. Sheldon's inimitable style and with the thread of his wholesome philosophy running through them."

new idea of summer footwear

JUST notice for yourself how many people are wearing them—everywhere you go—right through the summer.

Stand on any street corner in your town—person after person wearing canvas shoes with rubber soles.

In the last few years our ideas have changed about summer shoes. We are learning how to look fresh and cool and summery and be relaxed and comfortable. How to really enjoy summer pleasures. That's why millions of people put on Keds when warm weather comes.

Wear Keds all day long right through the summer. You will find them cool and comfortable, fresh and trim looking for general everyday wear and just right for all kinds of sports—for tennis, sailing, canoeing. They make you lighter, quicker—less likely to get tired.

Keds will give you an entirely new idea of canvas rubber-soled shoes—the various attractive models, the trim lines, the careful construction which makes them hold their shape and wear so well. You will notice immediately the fineness of the canvas, the whiteness of the rubber—a special process—the carefulness given to the finish, the details.

There are other kinds of Keds in addition to the models shown above. Many practical shoes for children, sandals, pumps, oxfords and high shoes. There are also Keds for men and for boys. You can get the style you wish at your dealer's. If he does not have them, he can get them for you.

Keds were originated and are made by the United States Rubber Company only. Be sure to look for the name Keds on the shoe.

How can juice be kept in fruit pies?

This is just one of scores of cooking problems solved in "The Whys of Cooking," the cook book in which Janet M. Hill, founder of the Boston Cooking School, tells the cookery secrets that have made her famous, and gives many of the choicest of her exclusive recipes. This book gives the practical cookery help that every housekeeper wants. Well bound. Illustrated in color.

More than 100 pages. Every copy costs us 26c wholesale, but is sent to Crisco users for 10c in stamps. Not for sale elsewhere. Send for your copy now, to Section S-7, Department of Home Economics, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, Ohio.

BAKE a juicy pie in a glass plate in a hot oven (with the heat coming from below) and it will have a dry, crisp crust. The glass heats quickly and bakes the lower crust before the juice can soak in. Reduce the heat to finish baking the pie.

There are remedies as simple as this for every one of your pastry troubles. Using Crisco for shortening will prevent many of them. Crisco helps to prevent tough pastry because it is the richest shortening and works into the dough with little handling. It prevents indigestible pastry because it is a healthful vegetable product. It prevents all greasy taste because it has neither taste nor odor; its delicacy permits the full flavor of the pie filling to prevail.

Make pie crust once with Crisco, according to the approved domestic science rules (see cook book offered to the left) and you never will go back to the old-fashioned methods. This modern cooking fat is different from anything you have used—unlike lard in origin and effect. Use it for all your cooking. See how much it improves everything that you make.

Get Crisco from your grocer, in sanitary dust-proof containers, holding one pound or more, net weight. It never is sold in bulk.

Historic Mildmay Park

Where King George III Read the Declaration of Independence

By ARMSTRONG PERRY

THE scene at the signing of our Declaration of Independence has been painted, written, and sung until every American can visualize old Independence Hall, the Liberty Bell and belfry, and even the principal characters.

How many have thought to inquire where the Declaration went from there—whether it was delivered to that country whose interest in it was second only to our own, or whether it was merely filed for future reference while American soldiers continued their fight to throw off the yoke which they had declared should no longer bind them?

Last summer I chanced upon the spot whereon occurred a scene which seems to be known to but few Americans, though it is as vitally a part of United States history as what occurred on July 4, 1776.

It was a warm, moonlight July night. I arrived at Waterloo station, London, from Southampton just as the hands of the big clock outside the train-shed came together at the midnight hour. Outside I climbed to the upper deck of a green motor bus and started north. I know it was north, not because the streets we threaded ran in any particular direction, but because whenever I could see the stars I always found Polaris dead ahead.

As we crossed Waterloo Bridge I saw Parliament on the left. Later we passed The Strand, Fleet Street, St. Paul's, and other streets and structures known to all the world. In half an hour we came to a public square, known as The Angel because of a bronze-colored figure supposed to be a likeness of one of those heavenly beings. She was advertising a tavern, or a cinema. Here we turned into Essex Road.

THE houses grew lower and lower, the streets narrower and narrower and the people we passed poorer and poorer. After fifteen minutes in thoroughfares where no one seemed to care to embark or alight we rumbled across a bridge over a railway and skirted a high wall for some distance.

"Mildmay Park, sir," said the guard. Those courteous busmen—they never shout nor forget!

I stepped down with thanks and found myself before a closed gate bearing the familiar red triangle of the Y. M. C. A. I knocked, and as though to fulfil the promise of the Scriptures it was immediately opened unto me.

A paved pathway conducted me to an office where lights were burning. Entering here I learned that Mildmay Park was occupied principally, though not completely, by the British Y. M. C. A. Training College, an institution similar to the "Y" colleges in Springfield, Mass., and Chicago. I was greeted by Mr. Summers, the executive secretary, who is an alumnus of Springfield. He explained that my room was not quite ready—which was not to be wondered at, as not only I, but three hundred and seventy-five others were arriving twelve hours ahead of schedule and in the middle of the night—and bade me feel at home.

The air was balmy and I began exploring the grounds. Through an iron gate I passed into a yard where, except for a cement tennis court, the level ground was covered with the turf the English love. After ten days on shipboard it had a feeling that lightened the feet.

At one end was a hedgerow. A gravelly path crunched sociably as I followed it through an opening. There in the moonlight stood one of the most beautiful trees I have ever seen. Its spread I estimated at sixty feet. Its leaves were wonderfully thick and there was a thrill in their rustle as they moved in the night breezes. The trunk was large and twisted, as though it had seen strife and known sorrow, but otherwise it showed no sign of age. I was in doubt as to its identity until in fingering a branch I touched a rough green berry. It was a mulberry—the tree whose sacrifice to the silk-worm clothes the beauteous maidens of the world for life's most vital moments.

MR. SUMMERS found me here. English hospitality always has in store some surprise, some unexpected delight to make every guest feel that he is a guest of honor.

"I see you like trees," he ventured.

"Indeed, yes!" I replied. "What a fine mulberry you have here."

"Yes, and it has a history," he responded.

"Like almost everything in London," I added.

"No—a history of particular interest to Americans," he replied, taking me literally.

Greatly interested, I asked for the story.

"Mildmay Park was on the outskirts of Middlesex Forest, famous in early English history," he began, broadening the subject to give me the proper connections. "Henry VIII built a hunting-lodge here. It still stands, the other side of the chapel yonder, used now as a home for nurses."

We moved to a position where we could see it in the moonlight, a quaint three-story stone house covered with luxuriant ivy.

"Fair Queen Bess used to come here during her sister's reign. Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, her favorite, lived here in the village of Newington. John Gilpin passed this way on his famous ride. Isaak Walton often strolled on the lea near by. It was here that Charles Lamb gathered some of his choicest material for the 'Essays of Elia.'"

The succession of famous names with their varying associations fairly dizzied me, but he went on, and my interest deepened.

"De Foe wrote 'Robinson Crusoe' in a house on what is now called De Foe Street, around the corner yonder. Rogers, who wrote that once famous book 'Pleasure of Memory,' used to look out into his summer garden from the window of a building up the street, now occupied as a printing office. Oliver Cromwell's daughter lies buried under a little old church whose bell you can hear of a Sabbath morning. Queen Bess worshipped in that church, and the pew is still preserved."

HE PAUSED a moment for me to mentally arrange these facts, then continued:

"John Howard, the philanthropist, occupied a house in Church Row, which is but a few moments' walk away. Isaac Watts, whose hymns are sung in America and all Christian lands, came here to Newington as a dissenting minister. His health failed and he remained to write hymns. His home was in Abney Park, near by. Edgar Allan Poe said that he owed much of the romantic element in his character to the years he spent here—five of them, at the most impressionable age. He was placed in a school here by his adopted father, Mr. Allan of Baltimore."

Another pause. My thoughts were busy with the significance of these great lives in American history. Who among us has not, in the church where first he learned of his duty toward God and Country, been stirred by those solemn hymns of Watts: "Joy to the World," and "O God, Our Help in Ages Past"? And what American school-boy has not read, diagrammed, scanned and otherwise dissected Poe's "Raven"?

"I am not giving you the history of Mildmay Park and Newington Green in chronological order," Mr. Summers resumed. "If I were to do that I would need to begin with the Roman wall whose remains you may see near Broad Street. That was ancient even when the Earl of Warwick fell here in a battle fought in 1471. At Tewkesbury and St. Albans, which adjoin Newington, much blue blood was spilled in the War of the Roses."

"A strange contrast with the name 'Mildmay Park,'" I remarked.

"The name Mildmay Park comes from Sir Henry Mildmay, who acquired this estate by marriage in the reign of Charles I," he explained. "Later it became known as Mildmay Mission, during the period when Rev. William Pennfather of the Church of England was vicar of Barnet Christ Church. He invited your famous evangelist, Dwight L. Moody here, and a series of annual conferences resulted. The inspiration derived from these was given to America through the Northfield and Chicago conferences."

HE TURNED to the mulberry. "Now for the history of the tree, and for the event most intimately connected with American history," he said. "About three hundred years ago the Huguenots—Protestants—were driven out of France. A company of them purchased Mildmay Park. As a means of subsistence they started a silk industry by planting mulberry trees. This is one of the original trees."

"Later, Mildmay Park reverted to its old use and became a rendezvous for George III. and his inner circle of nobles. They met here within these walls under this very tree, as mentioned in records of the time. Screened from prying eyes they discussed informally the weighty affairs of the moment."

My imagination readily reconstructed the scene as I sat there with the moonlight filtering through the leaves—the corpulent and pompous king, the nobles, the ladies, the gossiping discussion of affairs upon which hung the destiny of civilization.

"One day there came a sealed parchment from America. The king opened it. It was the Declaration of Independence."

Outside the gate of Mildmay Park

For the first time in my life I realized that the Declaration of Independence had not only been signed but that copies of it also were sealed and delivered. Of course the king had known that the fight was on, for there had been ample time for the news of Lexington and Concord to reach London, not to mention that of armed revolts, such as the Boston Tea Party, which had been taking place in the colonies during the past two years. But all these to the monarch's mind were but the acts of hot-headed, unorganized rebels. The levying of his stamp taxes and other acts of authority were but the ordinary processes of government, supported by many precedents. America was full of loyal British subjects and lawlessness could be checked by force of arms. That had been his point of view. Those around him had believed it, too, and had counseled the throwing down of the city of Boston about the ears of its rebellious inhabitants as though it could be done with impunity and justice.

HOW did George III. feel that August morning when he unrolled that parchment under this mulberry tree and discovered that all the American colonies had united and organized to throw off his authority?

Did he take it seriously or did he laugh at it, imagining himself too powerful to have his grip shaken from his possessions in the New World?

Certain it is that the little group at Mildmay Park did not get the point of view of America nor appreciate her spirit. How could this privileged aristocracy, living in ease and comfort, understand the feelings of our hard-working ancestors whom they were trying to govern? What common basis of experience was there behind those who lolled under the shade of the mulberry tree in this garden spot of the world's greatest city and those to whom a tree was more often an obstruction in the way of plow and progress—an obstruction to be removed by dint of hard and dangerous labor? How can a spirit nurtured within brick walls and the even closer confines of courtly convention comprehend the aspirations of those who live where the rolling ocean and the endless forests speak alike of unhampered freedom?

They sat here in the pleasant shade and sipped their tea and made the same old mistake of palace and parliament and—dare we breathe it?—of White House. Imagined that they understood the needs of people whom they had never seen. Imagined that they, three thousand miles away, could enforce their will upon unwilling subjects and compel those subjects to pay the expenses of the operation.

And so my thoughts ran on until, as the bell in a church tower struck two a delegation of three hundred boy scouts, products of the democracy which placed the Declaration of Independence in the hands of fat King George at Mildmay Park and then backed it up, marched in and prepared to "shake down." Then I went with them into the gymnasium which had been a chapel, lay down and fell asleep under the inscription: "The Lord is My Shepherd, I shall not want."

With the Missionary in Overalls

TWO facts become evident from a study of outstanding examples of industrial missions. The first is axiomatic. Successful effort depends upon dynamic leadership. Without such men as Bailie and Reisner, Higginbottom and Edmunds, Slater of Etah, Stewart and Henderson of Lovedale, Grubb of South America—men who have thought in economic terms and who have had the power to realize their dreams—these achievements would have been impossible. It follows that we must discover other leaders if we are to achieve the economic salvation of countries.

The other fact has not apparently been recognized by students of missions, for the reason perhaps that students of missions have not as yet greatly concerned themselves with economics. Namely this: the industrial missions that can be called "successful" from the standpoint of affecting the economic situation in missionary countries are all of the agricultural type. Apparently we have not succeeded in developing a type of missions that is vitally affecting the problems of industrialization. Trade schools do little more at present than train native youth to become more or less skilled craftsmen. And craftsmen must have more than their skill if they are to effect significant economic changes; along with skill there must go some knowledge of natural resources, some sense of proprietorship in them, and of responsibility for their use.

Christian social settlements like the Tokyo Tabernacle and the work of the Baptist Mission in Shanghai and of the South African compounds and interior mission in the Transvaal do little more economically speaking than to ease somewhat industrial wrongs.

This is not meant as a criticism of social settlements or of trade schools. Neither would claim to make a large contribution to the solution of problems of capital and labor. Who on the face of God's earth knows how to control developing industrialism? Yet, business men are at the job for profit's sake. Someone needs to attack it for people's sake.

Before attempting any conclusions regarding this type of missionary activity it is well to note briefly the general industrial features of the chief countries for whose economic development the Church should feel concern.

The Final Article of a Series on Industrial Mission Activities

By WINIFRED L. CHAPPELL

Japan is already largely industrialized. How rapidly the process has gone forward was revealed by the figures of the Interchurch World Movement Survey. In 1900 there were 1,400 industrial firms; in 1919, 30,000. In 1900 there were 120,000 factory workers; in 1919, 2,000,000. The frightful accompanying social results are now well known. The Church has not been, perhaps, totally without wholesome influence. Some Christian business men, taking their new religion literally, are seeking to make their own firms Christian as far as labor conditions are concerned, while there has been some attempt on the part of missionaries to mitigate industrial miseries. But the ungodly system whereby fortunes may be wrung from the lives of the workers has not been prevented from coming to fruition in Japan. The churches seem almost content if they can minister to factory workers. "Scores of factories," said the Interchurch Survey with a degree of content, "are now welcoming the missionaries." Individual missionaries and an occasional report, to be sure, stress the new need. "Here is a field we long to enter—but funds at hand do not allow," says one report referring to sanitary conditions in an industrial center.

It is not certain that the Church can make much contribution at this late stage. Unless, perchance, it should through a new form of organization, set itself, quite fearless of conservative opinion, to help the democratic movement in Japan which, developing under oppression, is taking both political and economic form.

CHINA is still in the agricultural and handicraft stage. Eighty-five per cent. of her people are said to live by agriculture, and the Chinese are noted for their intensive farming. In the cities artisans are busy in their little workshops along the streets, "smiths in iron, tin, copper, brass and silver, the carvers of ivory, amber, tortoiseshell, onyx and jade, the workers in wood, rattan, lacquer, wax and feathers, the weavers of linen, cotton and silk."

It is a land of vast poverty. "No natural resource is too trifling to be turned to account by a teeming population," says Professor Ross. "The sea is raked and strained for edible plunder. Seaweed and kelp have a place in the larder. Great quantities of shell-fish no bigger than one's finger-nail are opened and made to yield food that finds its way far inland. . . . The roadside ditches are bailed out for the sake of fishes no longer than one's finger. On the Hong Kong waterfront the paths of the coolies carrying produce between warehouse and junk are lined with tattered women, most of them with a baby on their backs. Where bags and beans of rice are in transit a dozen wait with bag and brush to sweep up the grain dropped from the sacks." "Careful observers say that four-fifths of the conversation among the common Chinese relates to food." "In their outlook on life most Chinese are rank materialists." Yet "they are capable of the highest idealism . . . the materialism is imposed by hard economic conditions. It is the product of an age-long anxiety about tomorrow's rice."

It is also a land of vast resources—inexhaustible coal and iron-ore deposits, antimony, salt, natural gas, cotton and many agricultural products.

And industrialization goes on apace. China is "at the dawn of what may prove to be the greatest industrial and commercial development the world has yet witnessed," with one-quarter of the world's population and with access to such resources. In Hunan the Pingsiang Collieries, the property of that great industrial organization of China, the Hanyehping Iron and Steel Company, and in Chihli, the Kailan Mining Company, are indicative of the changing situation.

It is well that industrialization should take place? The Interchurch Survey seemed to assume that it is, saying that China with four hundred million population can feed and clothe herself if given modern methods and machinery. The student of economic history groans in spirit, knowing something of the vast human suffering that impends as little workshops and home industries give way to factory production, as yellow-skinned, slant-eyed youth begin to go up from country-side and village to the rapidly growing industrial cities. The world's business interests are set to that accomplishment.

But one who possesses something of constructive imagination pictures an alert young China setting herself to modify economic history; to determine the course that her economic development shall take. It would be a wonderful adventure for the Church to inspire and to aid such an effort.

SO ALSO in India. It is an agricultural nation and a nation of handicraft, of cottage industries—hereditary crafts with religious significance in the eyes of the people; pride in the traditional workmanship of family and caste.

But the industrial revolution impends. British business and American business will see that it is accomplished. Notable government reports like those of the Calcutta University Commission and the Indian Industrial Commission indicate that England, whose business enterprise has already largely destroyed certain of the old indigenous crafts, will continue the process with even more deliberation. Already there are cotton-mills in Bombay, jute-mills in Calcutta, steel-mills in various cities, mines of coal, mica, silver, manganese, tin, tungsten and "the steady shifting of multitudes of workers to the busy, grimy, deadly slums"—a change "coming over this dreamy old land."

A strange situation is presented here—beautiful old arts hard up against machine production. There is probably no inherent reason why handicraft should not be retained and developed—alongside of machine production in certain fields where concentration is desirable. India offers a singular opportunity for experiment, the more as the Co-operative Credit Acts promote co-operation so important in a nation of small holdings and small industries. Here is a point of contact for the Church, as the Y. M. C. A. has admirably shown.

India and China are old, old lands. In social history Africa is young. Here the missionary's task has to do with peoples emerging from savagery or barbarism. Not greater in social interest is the juxtaposition in India of handicraft and machinery, than is the situation here created by the presence of raw natives hard up against "civilization." Here we have what has been called the most difficult current problem in racial sociology, whites and blacks facing each other with growing venom. Africa has been and is still a vast area for exploitation. The Government seeks to mitigate this by a policy of segregation, but as one graphically says, "So often it is 'heads I win, tails you lose' when the white man tosses with the native." Stewart of Lovedale died in 1905 without realizing the dream that had inspired him in his long notable service of "bringing the native population into line with the European occupants of the land." How far the dream is from realization is indicated by the anxious words of Stewart's successor Dr. Henderson, "A conflict appears inevitable, to which none of us who know the position can look forward without grave apprehension."

Industrial missions have sought to give training in trades and in agriculture. The latter especially will continue of importance, and its development will help meet the situation of developing industrialism. The former, too, probably has a permanent place. But who shall say what measure shall be taken in regard to those vast industrial enterprises on the Rand sucking in the raw natives of the veldt, Johannesburg alone, as Willard Price reminds us, a pool that swallows 20,000 men a year from a thousand miles north and one thousand miles south. If the Church is to be a vital factor she must lay hold of the situation with an energy and initiative and audacity at least equal to that manifested by the business interests which, as

In compounds such as this many thousands of negro mine workers are concentrated in the Rand, Africa. Here a few scores are gathered to hear the Gospel the Interchurch Survey points out, "are exploiting every nook and corner in Central Africa."

FINALLY there is the economic situation of Latin America which, according to the Interchurch Survey, "has the largest stretch of undeveloped fertile land in the world," making great advance during the twentieth century inevitable. "The world's attention is rapidly shifting to Latin-America where the food products, room for overcrowded populations, and a market for surplus goods and capital command universal interest. Beginning at the Rio Grande and extending down through Mexico, Central America across Panama, over Colombia, Brazil, Peru and Chile and the abounding plains of the Argentine to the straits of Magellan is the largest stretch of undeveloped fertile land in the entire world. . . . Capitalists, manufacturers, steamship directors, food economists and political leaders in Europe, North America and even Japan are . . . intently fixing their attention on these fallow lands."

But it is in Latin America that that saddest of all groups, the Latin-American proletariat, forty million Indian slaves exist. Peons, practically all illiterate,

Latin America, too, has its problems of industrialization, and Indians from the interior are lured to the ports and industrial centers to toil long hours at heavy tasks compose 60 per cent of the population of Latin America. Says the Interchurch Survey, "Justice to the Indian, this is one of the most pressing of all the needs in Latin America." The progressive republics of South America are interesting themselves in labor conditions. They should have the vigorous support and stimulus of the Christian Church.

As to Mexico American capitalists, according to the Interchurch Survey, have invested a billion dollars there. The evangelical churches after fifty years of experience and five years of scientific united study have a program for Mexico. Is it sufficiently comprehensive of Mexican economies?

IN THE meantime in all the countries where industrialization goes forward with its accompanying exploitation, the labor movement also develops. One finds only occasional mention of this in missionary reports, though it is a phenomenon of vast importance in the countries with which the Church is concerned. In Japan recently the workers engaged in a huge parade, demanding the ballot and frankly connecting the demand with their economic aspirations. During 1915, 1916 and 1917 there were spontaneous uprisings of factory workers, in 1918 the now well-known rice riots, and in 1919 the development of the use of "ca'canny" practiced intuitively by oppressed workers. South African business journals report native labor troubles on the Rand, between thirty and forty thousand blacks being on strike recently with well-organized pickets. In Latin America labor disputes have been taking the place of revolutions, the strike seemingly flourishing in the South American atmosphere. In India there were strikes in Bombay, 200,000 mill-hands from the cotton mills going out so suddenly as to surprise the mill-owners, and in Calcutta and other cities as well. Bal Gangadhar Tilak, who has been called the greatest of living Indians, has been speaking to audiences of many thousands in Bombay and Madras reminding the people that according to government figures about 15,000,000 people go with only one meal a day. "You must remedy this condition," he is saying, "it will not come from Heaven."

It is significant that the workers recognize the internationalism of their cause. The India Labor Union of America carries on its propaganda here; the New York Call last year reported that the I. W. W. Defense Committee had received a check from the International Socialist League of South Africa with a note to the effect that though in financial need they wanted to help; the National Executive Committee of the Socialist party in the United States sent out a May Day proclamation greeting workers in all lands, "of whatever nationality, race, color or creed."

SEVERAL tentative conclusions have been reached after a study of industrial missions and of economic conditions in missionary countries.

First. Missionary practice and policy in regard to industrial missions have proceeded so far that we may consider this type of work to have won a permanent place. Thus far the trial and error method has been used. The time has come for a deliberate program based upon the findings of a commission or commissions of experts.

Second. It would seem that the type of agricultural missions developed at Allahabad, Nanking, Canton, and perhaps at some South African mission stations, offers an example to be followed in the development of agriculture in missionary countries. Such missions would need to be greatly extended and equipped; and they should be manned by experts.

Third. Industrial missions are not touching vitally the problems connected with the industrialization now in process in various countries. Missions now giving instruction in various trades would not claim to offer a solution, nor would such special effort to reach industrial populations as the Tokyo Tabernacle, the Baptist Settlement in Shanghai, and other similar activities.

Fourth. It should be possible to develop a type of industrial missions that would actually contribute to the economic development of nations. It is too much to hope that the Church which has not succeeded in Christianizing industry and commerce at home can directly Christianize either international trade relations or the labor movement developing in foreign countries. But it may by counter-attack deprive selfish commercial interests of their power and put into the hands of the peoples the means of their own economic salvation. This counter-attack lies in giving the people knowledge of their own resources and technical skill for the development of those resources. This should be the concern of The Greater Industrial Missions. Peoples with this peaceful weapon will resist exploitation, whether by domestic or foreign business, or by governments, and will develop their own industries and their own type of economic organization.

Fifth. Such industrial missions have spiritual possibilities beyond our dreams. The old theology and philosophy sought to bring God from afar. The new finds Him in the material and social resources of life. It looks toward a society in which the peoples of the world co-operating with each other and using material goods for spiritual ends shall together develop the Commonwealth of God.

Do-As-You-Please Day

A Fourth of July Story

By

ANNIE HAMILTON DONNELL

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

MARY BREWSTER smiled at the sudden remembrance of that funny little child-name of hers—she'd been the greatest kiddy for naming things! Then close upon the smile, snuffing it out altogether, came the remembrance that it had never been a do-as-you-please day to her. Oh, never, really.

She had, she remembered, asked her mother's fat old washerwoman what "Independence Day" meant. She could see herself now—a sharp-chinned, meagre little piece—sitting on the end of the long washbench, swinging her lean little legs.

"What's In-dip-pen-dunce, Mrs. O'Grady?" she had piped politely. That was one thing she had been, anyway—polite. "It's a pretty long word, isn't it?"

"Sure 'tis long, but the manin' av it is short intirely!" Mary, now—this moment—could hear that pleasant Irish laugh. "Suit yersilf—that's 'independence'!"

But the Mary-child had changed it to "do-as-you-please," which had a ripping, running little sound in her ears.

"And I never," sighed this Mary-woman, "celebrated a Do-As-You-Please Day. Twenty-four of them—uncelebrated. Supposing—"

"Tomorrow I will celebrate one!" laughed Mary, in the grip of the lovely inspiration. Why not? Just do the things all day that she wanted to do—lie in bed as late as she pleased, run away by herself to some glorious, all-alone piece of the big Outside, read, lounge—write a poem on Independence! On—love.

Run away from Father and the Infant Terrible next door, and all the bang and bustle of the Fourth—

Run away from Peter—for Peter would come tomorrow as he came on all his holidays. Mary had a vision of him coming, in his neat gray suit and neat, smooth-shaven face. He would bring her the same number of crimson roses, in the same neat box, that he had brought for three years, on holidays. The stems would be neatly clipped—for three years Mary had longed to implore Peter to leave those stems beautifully long. Tomorrow, on Do-As-You-Please Day, she'd ask him next time to leave them—but, no, tomorrow she was going to run away from Peter!

THE idea persisted in Mary's head. She played with it—grew on intimate terms—adopted it! For once she would do all the things she wanted to do, and leave undone the things she didn't! By bedtime she had arranged a dozen different programs and un-arranged them all. It would be better—"funner," that Mary-child would have said—to act on the pleasant spur of the moments, as they came. Plenty of pleasant "spurs," thought Mary.

She wrote a note to her father, explaining why she was not up, making his beloved "fritters" for breakfast. She would leave the note where even near-sighted and absent-minded old fathers could not help seeing it.

"Because," wrote Mary, in an excited riot of tripping, slanted words, "I'm celebrating Independence Day, Father. I'm born free and equal today! So I am lying in bed till I want to get up—the coffee is measured out in the pot and yesterday's muffins are in the oven ready to have the gas lighted under them. There are doughnuts, cookies, cakes—you celebrate, too, and take your choice! Don't expect to see me till I appear in sight," etc.—there were a considerable number of "etc's." A score of things clamored to be said in that note to Father—about clean towels, and rubbers if it was damp, and the cold apple-pie and handkerchiefs and turning off the gas—especially turning off the gas.

Then Mary slept the sleep of the independent, and dreamed Peter came, and he and the roses withered.

SHE woke bright and early with the boom of celebrating cannons and the fizz-bangs of small and harmless crackers in her ears. The Infant Terrible next door had already begun his day. But Mary buried one ear pillow-deep and folded thicknesses of the sheet over the other and prepared to "lie abed" till such time as she "pleased" to get up, exactly such time.

A vagrant little breeze came in-window and tickled her nose with a soft strand of her hair. A bird perched itself on her window-sill and sang about what a glorious Fourth it was and how he and Mrs. Bird and the children were going to celebrate with a feast of particularly juicy Fourth o' July angle worms. She could hear the next-door child drumming reveille on his mother's dish-pan. Everybody was celebrating.

Mary sat up suddenly. She pushed back all her soft hair and laughed.

"Why, I want to get up!" she cried. And all the other mornings how she hadn't wanted! It was earlier, too, than usual. But if she wanted—this was the day of doing what she wanted!

She chose her neatest housedress and placed it ready on a chair. As soon as her hair was smoothed neatly back—

"But I want it loose and curly," Mary said. "And stretch and a little tumbling stream—someone had described it to her and the way to reach it. Oh, lovely woods and tumbly water!

"I will write a little poem on—love," thrilled Mary—this every-day and matter-of-fact Mary. But she had always known she could do it, given her chance. Today was to be her chance. Lovely little thoughts floated wistfully through her mind; the quiet little place of trees and water beckoned her.

THEN Father came down to breakfast and Mary sat opposite him in her usual place and poured his coffee. He looked across and did not know it was not the same Mary. His near-sighted eyes failed to see the light in her face.

"If you look through my apron you'll see I've got my best dress on!" laughed Mary, as she poured. "I don't believe you know it's Fourth of July today—I'm celebrating, Father!" In another moment she might go around the table and kiss his dear, puzzled face. Why not—if she "pleased" to? This was her chance. It came suddenly to Mary that she had not kissed Father since she was a little child. And now she wanted to. Wanting was—kissing, today!

His soft, old cheek was cool under her lips.

"Does it hurt?" smiled Mary. She reached to the little glass flower-bowl and selected a white pansy, a dark and royal blue one, a bit of a red rosebud. She pinned them in a red-white-and-blue cluster to Father's alpaca coat.

"Now you are celebrating, too!" said she. "We are a patriotic family." What was it—the kiss?—that made this little tender throbbing in her throat? She wanted to kiss the other cheek—if Father would only turn that one also! She wondered shyly how Father had liked the kiss.

The meal cleared briskly away and the great concealing apron doffed, Mary stood revealed in the soft white dress of celebration. Just one minute more to slip out into the back yard and hang up her towels and she would be ready to begin Do-As-You-Please Day in good earnest. She had Father's dinner arranged for and a luncheon for herself tied up in a little packet.

AH, BUT she slipped out into the back yard that one minute!

"Bunny," the Infant Terrible next door, was in his back yard, engaged in small snapping, fizzing, gun-powdery rites that had blackened his small countenance and apparently done things to his fingers. He waved them, bound about with bandages possibly once white, at Mary.

"I've burnt three thumbs an' two finger—" catching himself up with a little black-and-white grin and beginning over again, "I mean I've burnt three fingers an' two thumbs! My mother did 'em up, but now she's gone to bed. She's got both o' her ears stuffed full o' cotton. She says—says—the Infant's attention wandering from mothers to fire-crackers.

"What?—says what, Bunny?" prompted Mary, lingering a moment longer. Ah, it was lingering that moment longer that did it!

"Who says wh—oh, my mother says she guesses maybe pur-raps she'll be dead tonight."

"Bunny Davis!"

"She's got the nerves terribly," with small black-and-white calm. "She says my father'd ought not to sent me Fourth o' July money 'cause once she knew a boy all exploded to pieces an' she keeps a-seein' the pieces, an'—an'—"

"Oh, Bunny, do stop!" shuddered Mary. That poor, frail wisp of a mother, lying there dreading awful things! The little fizzy crackers did not look very terrible to Mary, but her heart went out to the poor mother. She remembered that Mrs. Davis had a serious heart trouble. Bunny was referring to it now, in his running comments.

"She makes me stop outside the door every time I go in to be banlidged an' say how bad it is an' where 'tis an' everythin'—fore she'll open her eyes an' look. She says it makes her heart jounce terribly. My mother's got a very jouncey heart."

"Bunny, listen!" Mary had firm hold of a grimy wrist. "Let me talk. Have you spent it all?—that money your father sent you? What?—only half? Then listen hard. How would you like to be a—boy scout today and go on a hike? Cook bacon on a forked stick and—everything, Bunny? A regular picnic hike, with flags because it's Fourth of July. Bunny, you get a lovely big flag with the rest of the

It came suddenly to Mary that she had not kissed father since she was a little child

I 'please' to put on a white dress with a blue ribbon," and little climbing red roses in a bunch, to finish out the patriotic colors of the day.

She left the soft hair loose and it attended, itself, to the matter of curls. She hung away the severe, neat dress and got out a fresh white, frilly one that matched the soft hair. But she consented to wear a great apron temporarily over the dainty whiteness. Then did this young and independent Mary slip downstairs the back way so as not to waken Father.

There was his note, bestowed painstakingly in the most conspicuous position!

"And here am I—up!" laughed Mary. "And, more than that, I'm going to make fritters for Father's breakfast because I want to make fritters for Father's breakfast!" If it was a joke it was a nice one that Mary liked. She sang as she collected her materials and set her breakfast table. The cloth must be a fresh one and the little glass bowl must be filled with red, white and blue flowers. It was going to be a Fourth of July breakfast.

"A Do-As-You-Please one!" she nodded with decision, for wasn't she do-as-you-pleasing? Though it was a joke! But only up to nine o'clock—or half-past eight o'clock. After that her independent day was to begin in good earnest. No joke about "after that." She planned where she would go in the big Outside, to be quite alone. She knew of a woodsy money! And if you carry back all the crackers and torpedoes you haven't opened they'll give you little flags for them—to wear in all our button-holes, Bunny!" Mary's eyes were lighted. Bunny's opened very wide and remained wide.

"Honest?" he gulped. Then "Hoo-ray!" and, snatching up his unbroken packages, he was off on a run to the firecracker place that was also a place of flags.

MARY went in to the frail little mother and told her the news through the cotton wool in both ears. Mrs. Davis had no difficulty hearing, so beautifully penetrating is good news. The relief in her pale little face "choked" Mary.

"My dear! You are an angel, there in that white robe! All you haven't got is wings! If you knew if anybody but me could know the tortures Fourth of Julys are to me. Since—since—once I saw—"

"I know," soothed Mary. "Bunny told me. Don't think about it any more—this one isn't going to be a torture! We'll have a lovely harmless picnic. If you felt able to help put up a lunch—"

"If I only did!" laughed Bunny's mother. "See me put up a beautiful one—I'm invited, too? Don't say I'm not!"

"Of course you are going, too! And Father—I must go and break it to Father. I don't believe he remembers what a picnic is."

"Well, we'll show him one! Does he like jelly tarts? I've got pie-crust all made, in the flour barrel—'keeping' just for a picnic! Won't take more than twenty minutes to whisk it into tarts—we'll take the jelly in a tumbler and fill 'em when we get there. Oh, I feel as light as air, now I've stopped dreading! Flags, you say Bunny's going to get with his money?"

"Flags," nodded Mary.

"Oh, the lovely idea! You did it—angel! But I can't see why you should do all this for neighbors, plain neighbors—"

"Why? Because I want to!" Mary cried in a happy singing voice. That was the surprising thing about it—she wanted this picnic with the others! She went singing back to Father and broke it to him.

"You can find 'specimens,' Father—plants and rocks and all sorts of nice you-things! And maybe a wonderful butterfly—take your net. Maybe you'll be a famous discoverer today!"

His clear old eyes traveled over Mary's face and the whole white sweetness of her, and a soft little shine crept into Father's face. He was thinking that he had "discovered" Mary. This new Mary who ordered people about; who said go to a picnic and they went—who slipped around tables and kissed old fathers. A Mary in a frilly white dress in the morning! Who called young terrors next door "Infant-Terribles" yet invited them to picnics and pinned little flags on them—an undiscovered Mary hitherto. Father liked his discovery.

THEY were all ready, with baskets and paper bags, by ten. Bunny, in a borrowed boy-scout suit, led them with a huge, waving flag.

"Left-right! Left-right! March!" he intoned shrilly. "I'll whistle the tune to keep step to."

But Mary had suddenly remembered Peter. In her bustle of planning and of preparing she had forgotten. Peter would come. She was marching—left, right; left, right away from Peter. That she had meant in the beginning to run away from him as well as from the rest of them did not at that moment occur to her. What she had meant to do in the first place and what she was doing now were so far apart.

She fell out of step with Bunny's tune and stood a moment, thinking.

Peter's strong young face, sober and plain, rose before her, with the wistfulness in its eyes—Mary knew that wistfulness. She knew what Peter wanted and patiently waited for. She had been a little impatient at his patience, herself. She had thought, without really putting the thought into words that a more brilliant, a little less patient, Peter would please her better. Perhaps—she was not quite sure—she had been waiting for one.

Now, standing here a moment, alone, she thought principally of Peter's disappointment when he came and found she was not here. The roses in the neat box under his arm would wither on their clipped-off stems. It was not kind to Peter and the roses to march away to that brisk little tune of Bunny's, without a word.

She went back to the house and wrote two words on a slip of paper and left it on the step, with a pebble to weight it down.

"Berry Woods."

If Peter found the slip, the two words would point the way to her, if he cared to follow, and Peter would care. If he did not notice the little paper, anyway she had done her best. She could do no more. She hurried on in the wake of Bunny's troop.

IT WAS a successful picnic. The tumbling little stream, the "scout" fire, and the bacon, the jelly tarts—all were factors of the success. Even the butterflies helped, Father and Bunny netting a wonder in blue and gold, that had never been discovered before in the annals of Father.

But Mary had no chance to sit by the tumbly water and write her little verse of love. She forgot about it in her watching for Peter. It seemed odd that he did not come. As the afternoon wore away it seemed a little frightening—as if something had happened to Peter. Mary was troubled.

"Peter," she said in her thoughts, "this is my Do-As-I-Please-Day, and I please for you to come! Come and bring me my roses, Peter!" But he did not come. She had not thought she would miss him like this.

If anything had happened—

She was not sorry when it was time to go home and Bunny and his flag led the way. The Fourth of July sun was slipping redly down behind the hills.

"I've had the dandiest time ever!" cried Bunny. "It's been so blessedly peaceful," sighed his little mother.

"I may be mistaken, but I don't think there's ever been another of the species in the state." Father, ruminated contentedly. He did not mean another picnic of the species, but another butterfly.

"But I missed Peter," Mary thought.

LATER, when the soft darkness settled over the world she slipped out of the house, to miss Peter by herself. And, as if he could not resist this new call of her heart, he came to her.

"Mary, is it you?"

"Peter! Oh—Peter!" because that was all she could say. His hand found hers in the dark.

"Why, Mary, I can't see, but you sound—you sound as if you were glad to see me, Mary!"

"I can't be glad to see you," she laughed softly, "but I'm glad to feel you, Peter."

"Mary! And I decided you didn't—I tried to stay away all day. But it was no use, I came tonight."

"I called you, Peter."

"You mean—dear, you mean you wanted me?"

"Oh, yes," sighed she, from the warm room of his arms; "I found out I wanted you, Peter, and it was my day to have what I wanted. I thought—I thought you were going to spoil my day!"

But he had crowned her day. He—this Peter—was the Peter she wanted. No other. She wanted him exactly like this, better and splendor than all the Peters of the earth!

"Did you bring my roses, Peter?" It was afterward now and they were seated together on the steps. She knew he must have brought them.

"I dropped the box when—when—" She knew when. "I'll go and pick it up. Mary, when I asked the flower-woman for scissors to cut the stems she told me—I've just found out they leave them long on purpose—I guess you've thought me a stupid—"

"Get them—get them!" she cried, "and I'll get the scissors. I want them short! I want them exactly the same." Peter's neat, dear roses, not a flower-woman's with splendid stems. She wanted no changes in Peter or her roses.

"Oh, I have had a beautiful day!" sighed Mary for very contentment therewith. "Every minute I've done as I pleased! I'm—doing as I please—now, Peter—"

"Mary, just once more, dear!" and as their lips met in the beautiful old way, Mary knew this was her verse of love.

Exhibits for the Sunday School

IN a certain well-patronized public library a number of weekly exhibits are of continual interest to the public. Especially educative are the exhibits situated close to the joint entrance to the general reading and children's rooms.

These exhibits are well worth copying for the Sunday school, for they furnish excellent counter interest to amusements which might keep people away from the Sunday school. For example, a recent library exhibit was entitled "Peoples to the South of Us." About three dozen postal cards illustrated types of the different peoples of Mexico, Central and South America, their homes and activities. This southern field is one in which the Church needs to educate the younger generation's more altruistic interest to parallel our commercial invasion southward.

Other library exhibits of a sociological scope included a city map showing the foreign population by colors in different districts of the city, photographs of housing activities, especially in the slums, reconstruction work in Europe, Red Cross activities, women who are aiding humanity, etc. Literary exhibits, such as pictures of American and foreign writers, and displays in keeping with anniversaries such as Dickens's birthday are of course a distinctly literary attraction.

For the children, especially, a glass case about the size of an ordinary glass display counter, set firmly on a long table, has housed exhibits of hand-crafts like wood carving, pottery, bead and basket work, paper toys, butterflies, Indian and historical relics.

Interesting and practical for the Sunday school—especially where a kindergarten or manual arts teacher will volunteer to co-operate—are the paper-constructed scenes. Thanksgiving, Pilgrim and harvest scenes, illustrated with homes and dolls, make the past much more vivid to children. Such objects as log cabins, Puritans, Plymouth Rock, the Mayflower, cornfields, Indians, spinning-wheels, settles and other details of the colonists' every-day life can be worked out effectively on a small scale. The religious significance of this holiday, as well as a nativity scene, for Christmas, is sure to appeal to every age in the church—the actual illustration of long ago events make them so much more real.

Suggestions for Picture and Curio Displays Which Will Add to the Interest

By MARION BROWNFIELD

WHETHER the exhibits are to be entirely the kind that can be pinned to a blackboard, wall, or burlap curtain, or articles of various kinds, it is a good plan to appoint a committee to plan carefully these exhibits for the fifty-two Sundays of the year with reference to all church programs and holidays. Missionary occasions, Easter and Children's day, for example, should each have special attention. It is easy to find suitable materials for a picture exhibit from such sources as post-cards, snapshots, newspaper illustrations—particularly the rotogravure sections—and magazines. An appeal to the congregation for pictures will make members more enthusiastic to view the exhibit, for everyone is more interested in a thing in which he has had a hand. Just an announcement from the pulpit of the topics planned, say three months in advance, coupled with the request for cooperation, should set the members of the congregation busy looking everywhere for their best pictures.

Among the picture exhibits possible are the following: The people in our missionary field, scenes about Bethlehem, Madonnas (during December), life of Christ, the Apostles, unique missions in the United States, interesting churches of our own denomination, from the smallest to the largest, community churches, social centers in the United States, Chinese boys and girls, mountain whites of the South, negroes who are helping their race, industrial plants which have welfare work for employees, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. activities (use this when support is called for), Jane Addams and Hull House, Juvenile court work, child labor, what the Salvation Army has done for children, prison betterment, Boy Scouts, Campfire Girls, children who have done brave deeds and so on, quite endlessly.

Charts to illustrate the pernicious effects of alcohol, narcotics and smoking, with lists of business firms who will not employ men who drink or smoke, are splendid for the young men's class, being successfully impersonal sermons, but none the less emphatic and authoritative!

Exhibits of articles are possible under such classifications as Bibles and books our grandparents used, souvenirs of the war brought home by our soldiers, plants mentioned in the Bible, utensils used in the countries where our missionary works, and costumes of natives in our mission territory.

From paper, clay and other simple inexpensive material may be constructed the early churches of America, homes in Turkey, Armenia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, China and Japan, for example, scenes illustrating the life of Christ, scenes along the Nile, industries of Biblical times, agriculture of the Bible, modes of travel (camel, donkey, primitive boats), famous buildings of the Bible.

Altogether the picture or article exhibit has great possibilities for interest and education for the Sunday school—and may be comprehensive enough to interest everyone from the Cradle Roll up to the Men's Club. It might even be an exchange feature between young people's societies of different churches. By circulating these exhibits, contributions from many sources can be gained to make them extremely worth-while.

A FANCY

By Amy E. Poppe

I LOVE to think my cares are sheep
That in the summer twilight go Over the distant slopes—until They're lost to sight behind the hill.
My Father does not care, I know;
But seems to smile with look, benign,
Upon this fancy, sweet, of mine.
So, when the hour comes for sleep,
I love to think my cares are sheep.

The Storm That Rages Around Admiral Sims

REAR ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS, because he has a sailor's habit of saying what he thinks, has brought another hornet's nest down about his ears. This time his frankness was directed against Sinn Fein and its American adherents, and was voiced in London in circumstances that resulted in a peremptory cancellation of his leave of absence by the Secretary of the Navy and his return to Washington to face his critics.

Admiral Sims is an ardent advocate of an official accord between Great Britain and the United States, although he has not publicly urged an accord to the point of an actual alliance such as Lord Northcliffe and a strong group of English and American publicists are seeking to bring about.

Aside from the fact that Admiral Sims attacked a faction in American politics that has considerable strength at the polls, the sharp criticism that has been leveled at him is based on the fact of his position as a high naval officer, and the rule of the service that naval and army officers must avoid public discussion of international relationships. The fact that this was not his first offense, and that he had been sharply reprimanded by President Roosevelt for a similar breach of regulations, has been pointedly recalled. The bitterness of the present attacks on him, however, have reacted somewhat against his enemies and has aroused to his defense a large class of responsible and far-thinking men and women who are firmly convinced that the best chance of permanent world peace is the very thing Admiral Sims inferentially favors—an Anglo-American entente.

It is Lord Northcliffe, with his 110 influential publications in England who is taking the lead in that country in advocacy of an alliance between England and the United States and the withdrawal by the British Empire from all other alliances, including those with France and Japan. It is his conviction that an understanding between the two English-speaking powers for the preservation of peace would present a block that no nation or combination of nations would dare affront. He has strong adherents in both his country and ours, and the question is certain to result in wide, and probably heated, discussion in the next few months. This is particularly true just now for the reason that the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance is on the table for the London foreign office for almost immediate decision. The British Government thus far seems to be about evenly divided on the question, but powerful influences in addition to those exerted by Northcliffe are being used to force a definite pro-American policy.

There has been no official indication in Washington of the Administration's attitude, and London is watching carefully all the news from the Capitol to see which way the wind blows. The London Times correspondent, in a despatch prominently displayed in his newspaper, says "the ultimate desire, even the deliberate plan, of the Harding administration, is to bring the United States and the British Empire together in a working agreement which shall be world-wide in scope."

Co-Workers with God

WHAT are you doing with your life? Have you reached the point where you have recognized the great truth that each of us is responsible for doing his or her share in carrying forward God's work in the world—that there can be no such thing as passive Christianity?

At no time has the call to the Lord's vineyard been so urgent as today. It is a time of spiritual harvesting and workers are needed everywhere. Great changes, which amount almost to complete transformations are taking place. The world is in transition. Potentates, rulers who held power over empires as a heritage, and had the fate of millions in their hands, have been swept aside. Thrones have crumbled to insignificance. It is a time of world-wide overturning, such as the prophets foresaw. And unless God's people everywhere stand fast in the faith and work mightily for and with Him, the divine plan for bringing order out of chaos may be long delayed in its accomplishment.

Our nation must turn its face resolutely toward the duty that calls us. We must unite, as never before in prayer and work for peace and righteousness. Not by church deliverances alone, nor by eloquent addresses can the soul of the nation be awakened to the duty that lies before it. The call is one that should be felt in the heart of every Christian. It summons us to individual duty, to grasp the new opportunity of doing personal work and of bringing souls into the Kingdom.

There is work for all, for the weak and poor, as well as the strong and affluent. Even a child can be taught to lift up the banner of the Cross. However humble your sphere, you can find opportunities for service—for working and praying in the line of God's purposes.

Make your life from today a record of work done for His sake Who has done and is still doing so much for you. In the home, the field, the workshop, or wherever duty calls, you can find opportunities. Be not a hearer only, but a doer in the helpful, spiritual efforts in your church, in your own family circle, and in kindly deeds, gracious sympathies and Christian encouragement strive to win others to the way of righteousness. Seek in prayer for divine wisdom and direction in all your activities, and you will be strengthened and equipped for every service. Finally, in all the work you undertake, give God the glory and be not ashamed to confess Christ before men. So may you make your life more abundant, laying up for yourself treasures the world can not bestow nor take away.

The Lure of Riches

THERE has been a good deal of discussion recently in the press concerning the right and wrong uses of wealth, and as to the arbitrary powers which excessive riches enables men of a certain type to assume. It has been claimed that the possession of such power conduces to an abnormal egotism, leading the individual to imagine himself a sort of superman, far above the range of his fellows, whom he learns to regard as mere pawns in the great game of which he is a master, and fit only to be used to minister to his desires.

Greece, in the ancient days, held that when a mortal rose to undue eminence and was swollen with pride and selfish indulgence, he became an offense to the gods. If their warnings passed unheeded they quickly compassed his downfall. His riches took wings. If on the other hand he showed wisdom and moderation, and practiced the virtues, and applied his influence and wealth to noble purposes, he was prospered and honored.

That wealth, with the power it puts within the reach of those who have not the right conception of its proper uses, is liable to become a menace to many, is abundantly proven by evidence that can not be set aside. It hardens the heart and makes it indifferent to the call of humanity, and careless of what is due to society. It condemns all that does not appeal to individual selfishness, to the love of pleasure and to the desire to be regarded as a "money king." A thousand opportunities for making it a means of blessing are missed. Obsessed by greed of gain and infatuated with the power it brings, the "poor-rich man" goes stumbling along through life, deaf to the call of duty and blind to the open doors of opportunity. Such was the man in the Interpreter's House of Bunyan's narrative, who kept raking straws and dirt, his eyes fixed on the ground while a Shining One bent over him, holding out to him a jeweled crown which he might easily have grasped for the reaching.

Answer These!

MR. EDISON'S Questionnaire has started the habit all over the country, by newspaper editors and school teachers and business generally, but we do not remember seeing any list of questions that covered the ground of real human experience. The list as Mr. Edison made it comprised what he called miscellaneous knowledge of certain facts in the scientific and material world. A knowledge of such facts might be of interest to the man who possessed them, but of no particular value as related to his human conduct.

As there is no patent carried by Mr. Edison or any one else in this matter of asking questions we venture on the following list which we claim is at least valuable in the direction of behavior:

- (1) Do you love your (wife) (husband) as much as when you were first married, and if not, why not?
- (2) When you die, how many people will be sorry, and what for?
- (3) If you had to write your own obituary, what would you put honestly on the tombstone?
- (4) How many enemies have you, and what makes them?
- (5) Are little children glad when they see you coming?
- (6) What is your definition of God?
- (7) Do you believe in a future life, and if not, why?
- (8) What is the best thing you ever did since you were born?
- (9) As you get older, do you get happier?
- (10) What is the source of your greatest pleasure?
- (11) What is your greatest fault? What do your friends think it is?
- (12) Do you always count honestly when playing golf?
- (13) Can you love an enemy?
- (14) Can you forget when you forgive?
- (15) Whom would you like to be if you could be some one else?
- (16) Do you get more fun out of being good or doing good?
- (17) What do you imagine will be your business or activity when you get to heaven, if you get there?
- (18) Do you pray, and if not, why not?
- (19) Do you think you are getting better or worse as you get older?
- (20) Is life on the whole worth while to you, and if so, why?

Thank you.

The Seventeen

WHAT Seventeen? The seventeen United States Senators who voted on June 1 against the additional Naval Appropriation.

As passed by the Senate, the bill carries $494,000,000 as compared with $396,000,000 voted by the House.

The vote on passage was 54 to 17. Five Republicans—Capper, Kansas; Norbeck, South Dakota, and Morris, Nebraska, voted against the bill.

The twelve Democrats opponents were Dial, South Carolina; Glase, Virginia; Harris, Georgia; Harrison, Mississippi; Heflin, Alabama; Hitchcock, Nebraska; King, Utah; Pomerene, Ohio; Sheppard, Texas; Stanley, Kentucky; Trammell, Florida; and Watson, Georgia.

Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas explained his vote as follows:

"Before the war we appropriated about $115,000,000 annually for naval purposes. I think $500,000,000 too much. Now the House committee went into this question thoroughly and after full discussion decided that $400,000,000 was ample to maintain a first-class navy. I think the House was nearer right than the Senate committee, and for that reason I favored the House report. The time has come to shut off the lavish expenditure of public funds. The whole country is staggering under the burdens of debt and war taxes."

If one of these seventeen Senators is from your state, and you believe as Senator Capper does that "The time has come to shut off the lavish expenditure of public funds," write to the man representing your state in the Senate and tell him that you are with him on that proposition. The Christian Herald is for reduced armament, in concerted movement with the other great powers. And it is also for decreased expenditure in the building up of a great navy at a time when all the nations are staggering under tremendous loads, and at a time when so far as any earthly power can determine no nation on earth either wishes to make war on us or could do it if it wished to.

When will the folly of the legislatures of the people stop? Great Britain, Japan, and France all have smaller naval appropriations than the amount voted by our own Senate. What nation among the world powers is preparing to attack us? Why should the United States take on a burden of nearly $500,000,000 when the whole earth is groaning over the tragedy of a war that has beggared the civilized world? How long, O Lord, how long!

The most promising development in sight are the conversations beginning between Mr. Hughes, Secretary of State, and the Japanese Ambassador, to reach an agreement on all outstanding Japanese-American questions, and the new Imperial Conference in session in London.

Dear Christian Herald:

Following some of your suggestions a few of our women brought together some parents to protest against the pictures shown our young people; for the present management has followed his own inclinations for seven years, and is making money at the expense of character building, we believe. When our High School Athletic association gave "Mid-Channel" as a Benefit, it seemed to furnish a concrete case upon which we could protest; the results so far as realized at present are the publicity given through our Daily News and appointment of a local censorship committee including the Manager.

Thanks are due you for a plan so practical that something tangible can be worked out for the protection of our people against vile, misleading, motion-picture films, and we believe every locality should wage war against this evil. We hope you will go right on with this work till there is no place in America where such films can be shown.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) Mrs. W. W. PARKER

Senate Rejects Peace Resolution Passed by House

CONGRESS has been having a difficult time in its efforts to bring about a technical state of peace through the adoption of a joint resolution and, with the Senate and House deadlocked as to the form of the resolution, its troubles continue. The leaders of the Senate majority agreed, after much discussion, to the Knox resolution, which was adopted and sent to the House. The House Foreign Affairs Committee did not like the wording of the resolution and substituted for it one drafted by its chairman, Representative Porter. Several weeks elapsed before the House took action and then the Porter resolution was adopted by a vote of 305 to 61—49 Democrats supporting it, while 60 Democrats and one Republican voted against it.

Speakers on the Democratic side vigorously attacked the Porter resolution as a poor sequence to the brave achievements of American soldiers in France, asserting that it would give to Germany every opportunity to disregard the rights of the United States and would afford no protection to American reservations under the armistice. The Republicans maintained that the resolution was merely technical and would be followed by a formal treaty of peace.

Section One of the Porter resolution is a declaration by Congress establishing "a state of technical peace" and "undertakes to do no more"; Section Two reserves all the rights of the United States by reason of its participation in the war and embodies "the qualifications essential to protect all our rights," according to Mr. Porter's explanation of it. The Knox resolution is broader and contains a repeal of the declaration of war—a step which Mr. Porter assailed as a repudiation of the war in which so many American soldiers lost their lives.

The Senate refused to accept the House substitute and the resolution was sent to conference, where several meetings failed to produce an agreement. With the authors of the rival resolutions on the conference committee, neither side was inclined to yield and it was considered probable the deadlock would continue until President Harding made his wishes in the matter more definitely apparent.

Deadlock on Navy Bill

TWO weeks of conferences have failed to bring an agreement on the Naval Appropriation bill, the Senate conferees demanding that the $98,000,000 which the Senate added to the measure shall be retained and the House conferees being equally firm for the reduction of the total to the $396,000,000 originally voted. The situation became so tense, in fact, that the House conferees abruptly walked out of the conference room and informed the Senators they were through with negotiations until the representatives of the upper chamber adopted a more conciliatory attitude.

One of the chief points of disagreement is over the Senate's addition of 20,000 men to the navy's personnel, an item involving $40,000,000. The House members contend that a force of 100,000 is adequate for the maintenance of the navy, while the Senators insist that such a figure would mean putting a considerable number of ships out of commission. Secretary Denby declared himself vigorously in favor of the Senate side of this argument. Another disputed item is for the purchase of foodstuffs, the House conferees contending that recent reductions in food prices make possible a material cut in the ration rate.

The Senate bill contains the Borah disarmament amendment, whereas a disarmament proposal was defeated in the House. House leaders decided to detach the disarmament resolution from the naval bill and to pass it as a separate measure.

Japanese Parleys Begun

SECRETARY HUGHES has begun conversations with Baron Kijuro Shidehara, the Japanese Ambassador in Washington, looking toward a settlement of all outstanding problems between the two governments. Several weeks will be required for the discussions, which take in the status of the island of Yap, Japanese immigration to this country, alien property rights, the restoration of Shantung to China, and the attitude of Japan with regard to Siberia. Satisfactory progress has been made so far, and there was evident a feeling that solutions acceptable to both countries could be reached.

Under the Wilson Administration, Baron Shidehara and Roland S. Morris, then Ambassador to Japan, negotiated for some time and reached certain identical conclusions with regard to a settlement of the California alien land question and the immigration problem. The Morris report was turned over to Secretary Hughes and he has been studying it for some time, but the Yap controversy and other points of difference between the two governments delayed action. The new negotiations were said to have been started at the suggestion of Japan, which is anxious for a clearing away of all the points which have tended to promote ill-feeling.

If the two governments are able to reach an agreement it will not be necessary for the League of Nations Council to seek to compose the Yap controversy and other matters, and European statesmen probably will be glad to be relieved of the embarrassment of rendering decisions. A settlement also would be a long step in the direction of the maintenance of world peace and might be expected to help greatly the movement for a limitation of naval armaments.

Reorganization Plans Opposed

ALTHOUGH the Joint Executive-Congressional Reorganization Commission has scarcely begun its work of planning the reorganization of federal departments in the interests of economy and efficiency, President Harding has found it necessary to issue a warning that efforts by those in the government service to influence Congress in this connection would result in the dismissal of the offending officials. This warning, which was given at a cabinet meeting for transmittal to bureau chiefs, followed a complaint by Walter F. Brown, of Ohio, chairman of the Commission and the President's representative on it, that an active propagandist movement was being conducted to defeat the reorganization plans. Several senators and representatives were beginning to feel the effects of it, and Mr. Harding decided prompt action was in order.

The reorganization will mean the transfer of certain bureaus from one department to another and probably the elimination of some duplicating bureaus or agencies. Naturally the men whose positions are in danger are concerned about the suggested changes and are unable to see the advantages of any step which might affect them adversely. The Commission has not advanced far in its work, but the growth of the federal departments has been so haphazard and undirected that many consolidations and transfers are desirable.

It was said at the White House that the Cabinet members were in thorough accord with the President's desire to effect a reorganization, but that there were differences of opinion as to the best methods of accomplishing it.

New Dry Chief Takes Office

A NEW Federal Prohibition Commissioner—Major Roy A. Haynes, of Hillsboro, Ohio—has taken up the task of enforcing national prohibition, and his first declaration of policies was that anything short of strict enforcement of the laws "means chaos, means Bolshevism." Major Haynes, who long has been active in Ohio politics and temperance matters, is forty-one years old and since 1908 has been editor of the Hillsboro Dispatch. He was endorsed for his present post by leaders of the Anti-Saloon League.

In talking to newspaper men, Major Haynes forecast the prompt passage of the supplemental Volstead bill prohibiting the use of beer in medical prescriptions and indicated that he does not consider it necessary to issue now the beer regulations formulated by the Internal Revenue Bureau. "The public may be advised," he said, "that early consideration will be given to the tentative draft of the proposed beer regulations that has been prepared. A final draft will be completed just as soon as conclusions can be reached, but in the meantime it appears that the Volstead bill will become a law and will be passed within a short time; then it would seem to be useless to issue the regulations, since the existing law may be changed so as to make the regulations ineffective."

He also made a plea that newspapers, playwrights and motion-picture producers refrain from holding the prohibitory laws up to ridicule and suggesting that they may be broken easily. Such a course would create a sentiment for breaking the law, and he declared that "the man or woman or agency which condones its violation or becomes a party to its violations or encourages a sentiment of laxity in regard to its enforcement is helping to create, consciously or unconsciously, a very serious condition. The first year of national dry enforcement has been waged against almost insuperable difficulties. Due credit should be given to former Commissioner Kramer, a man of sterling integrity, firm convictions and splendid courage, and to his helpers for the progress made. They were the pioneers and pioneers are always seriously handicapped."

Allies Seek to Delay Greek Drive

THE Greek Government has prepared for a new offensive against the Turkish Nationalists in Asia Minor in an effort to crush Mustapha Kemal and to restore the prestige which was damaged severely by their recent defeat at his hands. Generally efforts are made to keep secret the fact that an offensive is being planned, but the Greeks have been discussing their intentions freely, and King Constantine has arrived in Smyrna to take a direct part in the drive. He expressed confidence that his army would be victorious and indicated that he had 200,000 fighting men in Anatolia, with another 100,000 in reserve, whereas the forces of Mustapha Kemal were believed to number not more than 100,000 effectives.

The British, French and Italian Governments despatched to Greece a note calling for the postponement of the offensive and suggesting that the Allies arrange peace with the Kemalists. The peace terms to be offered were not carried in the note, but it was indicated they would be much the same as those proposed at the recent London conference—evacuation of the vilayet of Smyrna by the Greeks, as well as other important changes in the Sevres Treaty for the benefit of the Turks. This made Constantine's position extremely difficult, for whether he accepts or rejects the Allied demands his government will be in danger of falling.

In connection with the Near-Eastern situation, it is interesting to note an allocation by Pope Benedict, delivered before a secret consistory, in which he expressed deep anxiety over the situation in Palestine,

As Mont-Lawn Opens Its Doors

AS MONT-LAWN, the Children's Paradise, opens its doors for the busy summer season there is much more involved than just the drawing of a latch—just the throwing wide of a gate. As Mont-Lawn opens its doors it means that hearts are opening too—that the way has been paved for the sunshine and happiness and love that every child should know.

I wish that each one of you, who read this article, could see Mont-Lawn as it is today. Because I think that the sheer, breath-taking beauty of it would surprise you. I have seen Mont-Lawn many times a year—and for a number of years. And each glimpse of it gives me a new and wonderful inspiration. Each corner of it holds fresh possibilities. Sometimes I find it hard, almost, to put the thoughts that come to me into coherent words. For words, after all, are weak and impotent and Mont-Lawn is a vital, pulsing reality.

And yet—despite the obvious beauty of the Children's Paradise—it isn't that beauty that makes the greatest impression. It isn't the dainty little dormitories, resting so peacefully upon the velvet lawns; it isn't the cool splash of the swimming pool or the welcoming width of Fort Plenty. It isn't even the dim quiet of the Children's Temple—where even a very tiny kiddie can feel the reverence and wonder of prayer. It's something more important than the physical aspect of the place that makes Mont-Lawn so different from other Homes. It's something more intangible, more indefinite. It's something harder to grasp, to phrase.

PERHAPS the word "atmosphere" comes near to expressing what I try to say when I speak of indefinite somethings. Perhaps it's the word "charm" that I mean. And perhaps it's some uncoined word, some spirit word, that's a combination of both. Because there is a quality to Mont-Lawn that is unique and exceedingly beautiful. One feels instinctively that the little visitors at the Children's Paradise will know every sort of kindness, every sort of consideration. One feels that they will be treated, not as "charity kids," but as loved guests. One feels that they will be accorded every courtesy.

I like to think that this atmosphere of Mont-Lawn is a far-reaching one. I like to think that it isn't only the result of the training of the sweet young women who take care of the children—the result of the bounty and friendship that are so readily bestowed. I like to think that the warm inside beauty of the place is a reflection from the loving hearts of the friends of Mont-Lawn whose gifts, year after year, have made the Home a glorious possibility.

And They Are Wide Open Now for

I like to feel, somehow, that Mont-Lawn understands—that it knows the sort of material that it is built upon. I like to feel that the good wishes and prayers of the thousands of men and women who have remembered the little forgotten folk, are hovering over the peaceful vista of houses and green grass and trees. And I like to feel that the love of the One who blessed the children, so many centuries ago, is thrown—like a warm, encircling arm—around the whole of it!

Mont-Lawn—I wonder what the name stands for to you people who have never been privileged to see the home in all of its radiance? I wonder if the sound of the word, alone, can bring the sweetness of a dream to you? I, who have so often seen the Home, can draw all sorts of mental pictures from just saying the name over and over, and quite softly, to myself. I can see the majestic mountains in the distance and the cloudless summer skies, and the tall, green trees.

And—best of all—I can see the little slum children playing in the sun. I can see them with their cheeks and lips and eyes aglow, learning what real happiness may be.

Mountains in the distance,
Overlook the scene—
Not a cloud to mar the sky,
Trees of vivid green.

Little children playing
All, with youth, aglow,
Were they really in the slums
Not so long ago?

AS MONT-LAWN, the Children's Paradise, opens its doors for the summer season there is another door—an unseen door—that opens, too. It is the door of opportunity and, through it, the shy youngsters of the city can gaze into the future that is on its way. For Mont-Lawn gives something—a very important something—besides food and clothing and fresh air. Mont-Lawn gives faith and ideals. It gives a model of American home life to pattern after. And it gives a set of standards to build upon—real standards that are practical and worth-while.

The children who come so eagerly from the city to Mont-Lawn, are the future citizens of our country. From many dark homes they come—from many hopeless places. Oftentimes they are the little victims of environment, oftentimes they have no desire to struggle against circumstance. The only homes that they have ever seen have been dirty homes—the only people that they have ever known have been the hopeless people of the slums. They have never dreamed of white beds, and clean clothes and baths—many baths! They have never been brought up to the knowledge of fresh air and proper sanitation.

In this condition of pitiful ignorance they are transported to Mont-Lawn. And there they live in spotless houses and sleep in delightfully fresh beds—there they eat food that has been prepared neatly and daintily, and learn to keep themselves clean. There they realize the right way to live. And there they find the ideal upon which future American homes will be built—the ideal of health and strength and cleanliness.

Oftentimes going through the slums, I

What Can Our Women Do?

A Sermon by REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—John 19 : 25. "There were standing by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene."

THERE is surely no more significant grouping in the Sacred Word. Darkness is over Jerusalem. The Lord is stretched upon the Cross. The end is near. In all the noisy laughing hostile crowd which throngs the place of crucifixion, His friends are very few. His disciples are scattered like sheep that are chased by wolves. One has betrayed Him. Another has denied Him. All are in flight. A numb ecclesiasticism has done its worst. Brutality has triumphed. Jesus of Nazareth is dying on the tree.

And yet here is a little company clinging together at the very heart of the tragedy. They have followed the Master through the streets and lanes of Galilee and they have accompanied Him on the longer road to Jerusalem. Some of them have been healed by Him; they are the captives of gratitude. They have all been blessed by Him; they are the captives of love. No public hostility has weakened their friendship. No fear of the night, no fear of the darkness has turned them back. They have gone right into the thick gloom and they are the Lord's companions at the Cross. And they are women. "There were standing by the Cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene."

I have not been able to get away from this brave little company. And I am linking them with the tragedy of our own time. Who is standing by the Cross of Jesus in the new crucifixion? Many things are breaking up. One venerable thing after another is being thrown away. Our vision is confused. The new roads can scarcely be seen, and traveling is perilous and uncertain. Many of the old guides seem to be out of action. The familiar voices are speaking in unfamiliar tones and accents. Old party-cries sound like thin ghostly echoes from the chambers of a dead and buried world. Everything is in movement. But as yet movement has no definite trend; it is like the confused restlessness of a tideless sea.

AND that group of women by the Cross recurs to my mind, and they come again and again. And I am wondering what they can do for us in our own tumultuous days. Where is woman going to be found and what is to be her incomparable ministry? Will she be the trustful guardian of sacred causes? Will she be the fearless friend of the Lord? Will she be the steadfast custodian of His holy mission? Will she be the valiant soldier of His sovereign will? Will she take her place with the little company who gathered at the Cross, not afraid of the darkness, not daunted by the vested power of mighty adversaries, but standing faithful at the very heart of things, even when the adversary seems to have triumphed?

And if they valorously abide by the Cross of Jesus, what will they bring to the common lot? First of all, they will stand in our national affairs for the maintenance of the spiritual ideal. We are entering upon a period of reconstructive ministry. Everywhere there is being kindled a wonderful enthusiasm for social reform. The beneficent fires are burning in the camp of every political party. Every party program glows with the passion to remedy abuses and to make the crooked straight. Everybody is intent on moral adjustments. Turn where you will, these genial fires are burning.

And therefore the moral fervor which is to reconstruct the life of a nation must be defended and preserved by spiritual ideal and inspiration. For it is the spiritual which feeds the moral. The reforming fire needs to be fanned by the breath of Heaven.

And it is surely here that the women can exercise a ministry which will be priceless in its issues. A woman's power of spiritual vision is her supreme endowment. Her religion is an exquisite intuition. Her sense of God is an extra sense, a kind of added sensitiveness which crowns her with a spiritual appreciation of a superlative order. She reaches spiritual realities, not so much by a train of reasoning, as by an immediate discernment; not by stages of inference, but by an insight swift and direct as light. To use our familiar phrase, a woman is naturally religious, which means that all religious avenues in her life are more free and open and receptive to the mystic messengers and the mystic commerce which comes to us from the unseen world.

And have we any greater need than this—such a sense of the values of unseen things as will prevent the things that are seen from putting us into iron bondage? For who does not know that things may be our prison, and that the more you multiply the things the sterner may be our imprisonment. Things may constitute a terminus, or they may constitute a thoroughfare. Things may be a blind alley leading nowhere, or they may be an avenue opening into the fresh, sweet spaces of the open country. Things may just be a means of existence, or they may become a means of grace. Things may be a starting-point, or they may be a goal.

AND so we need the spiritual ideal, the spiritual vision, the spiritual inspiration. By all means let us busy ourselves in making the crooked straight. Wherever in our social and national relationships we see anything twisted out of rectitude—like crushed and twisted nerves and arteries through which the common blood cannot flow in healthy currents—let the deformity be a challenge to us, and let us set about to make the crooked straight. And wherever there is a rough place, roughened and coarsened by injustice, tearing the feet of weary pilgrims, let us smooth it out by just and kindly dealings, and make the rough place plain. But when wrong things have been put right, counted inferior to intellectual strength? Or is it to fare a subordinate rank behind legislative or political power?

The biggest thing, next to the sense of God, which God's women-folk can give to us, is a cleansing ennobling ministry of affection, an affection refined, passionate, skilful, ingenious, emancipating. More than ever are we going to need this mighty ministry, and the women who abide near the Cross of Christ are going to be the mighty servants of the Lord in the coming days of untraceable changes and transition.

What we need now, and what we shall need tomorrow, is some noble, pervasive, sacrificial energy which will stand as a sentinel at the moral frontiers and add itself as an army to the fighting forces of another's life. And what but love can supply this vigilance and courage? What but love can offer this mighty fighting power? Let me repeat it—love can add itself to another man's forces and thereby change an uncertain struggle into overwhelming victory. "Thou hast loved my soul out of the pit."

I know nothing more glorious in all the campaigns of moral and spiritual warfare than to see love calling out its reserves, and marching to another life, which is clouded by an almost forlorn hope, and kindling in those fields of despondency a spirit of courage which turns a rout into a brilliant triumph. Untold millions of men, ay, and women, too, have thus been shielded and saved by the heroic love of women; and it is because her love makes her the intimate kinsman of the Saviour of the world that we must ever regard it as the supreme jewel in her diadem, and the most powerful armor in all the shining panoply of her soul.

LET me name one other ministry in conclusion. It shall be the wealthy mission of woman, in the great days that are coming, to infuse into the mind and temper of the nation the spirit and conception of the family. All governmental matters are apt to be institutional and not inspirational. Reform is apt to be rigid and frigid, rather than free and natural. Our schemes of reformation can be more correct than human. A government may do a sort of carpentering work in joining together separated pieces of our dislocated society; but what we need is some strong, unifying spirit which can lead us into vital fellowship. We need more than national organization; we want a national organism. We shall not get very far if we only construct a finer machine. What we want is a nobler fraternal fellowship. We want more than an institution; we want a family. We want more than justice; we want humanity.

It is here that woman can play a tremendous part in the reconstruction of the next few years. She can help to vitalize cold statutes. She can spiritualize legal conventions. She can transform righteousness into goodness. She can make the blood of honest human feeling course and tingle through every nerve of our corporate life. More than any other, woman can convert nationality into fraternity, and make the city of Jerusalem the dwelling-place of the Lord.

These then, I think, are some of the primary ministries which can be rendered by woman in these momentous days? She can preserve among us the sensitive sense of God. She can keep alive the nation's soul. She can move among our complicated affairs in wise and disciplined affection. And she can infuse into the mind and temper of the nation the spirit and conception of the family. And all this she can be, and she will be; and all this she can do, if she abide by the Cross of Jesus. It is by the Cross of Jesus Christ that her own sacrificial love will be born and fed; and it is by the same Cross that she will enter into the solemn and wonderful inheritance of contagious joy and peace.

THE Near-East Relief is continuing indefinitely through the summer its campaign for contributions of warm clothing to be worn next winter by the destitute in Palestine, Syria, Armenia and other Near-Eastern countries in which the organization is conducting its widespread work of relief. With the stocks of clothing in those territories very low and with many thousands unable to make purchases, there will be widespread suffering when winter comes unless the people of America give their help. Discarded garments which are clean, warm and serviceable will be gladly received, and among the articles especially desired, are shoes in which there still is sturdy wear, warm stockings and shawls. Flimsy clothing such as evening dresses obviously would be of little use. If there is no collecting station in your vicinity, your donation should be sent by parcel post or prepaid express direct to the Near-East Relief, 549 West 39th Street, New York City.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour dear," or "Just as I Am Without One Plea."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Acts, 9 : 32-42. "The Raising of Dorcas."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 474, first column).

Sermon—"WHAT CAN OUR WOMEN DO?"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Blest Be the Tie That Binds," or "From Every Stormy Wind That Blows."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Into the retirement of service, and not of slothful and idle contentment, may we go from this service of the hour's worship, strengthened to do and to be in the name of Him who went about doing good, and found his resting-place in communion with the Father, even as we ourselves may find ours. We ask it in the assurance of faith and the happiness of friendship with Him. AMEN.

we shall need the wonderful spiritual power which transforms things into sacraments, and makes them the servants of a larger freedom and the helpmeets of our souls.

Well, who like woman can give us this sense of God, and the sense of the divine values of things? Who like her can keep the nation's soul alive? Who like her can be our leader through a reconstructive social life into the risen life in Christ? It was a woman who was the herald of the Resurrection. It may be that in a richer and fuller sense she is to be the herald of another resurrection. If she stands by the Lord in the dark hour, she may again be chosen to be the Lord's messenger on the resurrection morn. Our women can save our country. "There were standing by the Cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene." "Mary Magdalene cometh and telleth the disciples, I have seen the Lord."

NOW, what may woman do for us in these phenomenal days? She can exercise the ministry of wise and disciplined affection. There, you say, you are dropping into the realm of sentiment! Well, and from what day and date has noble sentiment come to be tabooed? I know there is a silly sort of emotion which can no more express itself in strong and royal service than a pretty table fountain can turn the miller's wheel. But I am not now speaking of daintily colored table fountains, but of rivers, brimming the meadows, flowing majestically to the open sea. I speak of noble sentiment, of strong chivalrous emotion, of large and enlightened affections, moving with unceasing fulness by the river of water of life. Have we come to a day when this mighty ministry is to be belittled or despised? Is the power of affe-

The Host of the Redeemed

SUNDAY. Rev. 7:9. "I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." There are multitudinous national elements fused into a living brotherhood. Here are racial differences losing themselves in a vital union, as ten thousand separate streams lose themselves in the communion of the great deep. The first essential to national brotherhood is the "white robe." That necessity is fundamental. If the "white robe" be missing, brotherhood will always be counterfeit and a phantom. "White robes" are holy habits.

The cleansed heart is the primary necessity to a true union of hearts. Impurities can never be brought into permanent union. We fight against the law of God when we seek to establish cohesion between the unclean. This is true in the life of the home, as well as in the life of the nation. True family union can only be realized when every member of the family wears the white robe.

All the members of the great company carried "palms in their hands." The palm was a favorite symbol of the Hebrew people. Perhaps its gracefulness, its queenliness, its faithful endurance throughout the changing seasons, had made the people regard it as a beautiful and persistent friend. It was used as a symbol of conquest and sovereignty, and as such it has come down to our own day. We speak of a man as "taking the palm," by which we indicate that, after making a comparison, we decide that among many men this man is the victor, the best. So the palm is the emblem of conquest.

This multitude "whom no man could number," comprising every nation and every tongue, bear palms in their hands. What have they conquered? Self. Each has dethroned himself that he may crown his brother. By love they serve one another. Family life is impossible when each member is self-assertive, and constitutes a force of personal aggression. Family life is possible and beautiful when every member carries a palm, a symbol that self is merged and lost in the welfare of the whole.

There is yet a third characteristic. The multitude whom no man can number have their family life consolidated by a common praise. They unite in the glorious song: "Salvation unto our God who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." There is no unifying influence like worship and praise. J. H. J.

Simplicity of God's Revelation

MONDAY. John 3:16. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." Religion is the revelation of God through Jesus Christ to the heart of man. Theology is what other men have said concerning that revelation. We are not Christians because we are theologians. We are theologians because we are Christians. Before we had the science of botany we had flowers. Before we had the science of astronomy we had stars. Before we had the science of theology we had God.

All sciences are complex. The rose of Christ is easier to understand than the botany of Christ. The Star of Bethlehem shines brighter than all other stars. Christianity as taught by the Master is simpler than theology of the school-masters. God's revelations can be stated in the simplest terms, in words of one syllable. The sun shines, the flower blooms, the rain falls, the brook sings, the bee hums, the tree grows—God is Love. God so loved that He gave His Son.

Spurgeon tells of a book of three pages. The pages are black, red and white. The black is for man's sin, the red is for the atoning blood, and the white is for man's soul cleansed from all unrighteousness. This is a simple description of the work of grace. We find no difficulty in understanding it. Vast systems of philosophy attempt to explain it. The heart of man needs no logic to grasp it. God's love is so great that it includes the last, the lost and the least. Jesus Christ died for all men everywhere. We can sing with Isaac Watts:

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my life, my soul, my all."

R. B.

Amazing Love

TUESDAY. Eph. 3:19. "The Love that passeth knowledge." It is related that a native helper in India, while engaged in assisting the missionary in translating the Scriptures into his native tongue, paused at this passage and said brokenly, "I cannot write it! O master, let me rather write, 'What manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be permitted to kiss His feet!'" But the Father will not have it so.

By faith in Christ we are restored to every privilege of sonship—the ring, the best robe and the forfeited inheritance.

Behold, what manner of love is this! What shall we render unto the Lord for His loving kindness? The utmost we can do is to take the cup of His salvation and pay unto Him our solemn vows.

"It passeth knowledge, that dear love of thine,
My Jesus, Saviour; yet this heart of mine
Would sing a love so rich, so full, so free,
Which brought an undone sinner such as me,
Right home to God!" D. J. B.

Going In and Going Out

WEDNESDAY. John, 10:9. "I am the door: by me if any man enter in he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture." Long before the ministry of Jesus, the imagery of the shepherd and the sheep had enriched the sacred writings. David, a shepherd himself, made frequent and eloquent use of it. Isaiah and Ezekiel and Micah all saw the coming Messiah as the Shepherd of Israel, and following the ministry of Jesus, Peter and the writer to the Hebrews used the analogy with touching effect. It was most natural, then, for Jesus to say, "I am the good shepherd."

Contrary to the thought of many, the Christian life is not a narrow life. It is the life of expansion. "They shall go in and out and find pasture." That means that the horizon of the Christian is ever widening. Like the chambered nautilus, he has left his outgrown shell by life's unrelenting sea. "He shall be saved" first of all from a self-centered existence; saved from investing his treasure on this earth; saved from a life of cowardly compromise; saved from smug, well-fed self-righteousness.

The epitome of the Gospel is expressed in those two words "come" and "go." When we come to Jesus we are going in. When we go to men, we are going out. We are not only saved to feed, but saved to serve. We are not saved from wasteful idleness alone, but saved for effective activity. The "going in" must stand for the inward experience of the Christian life; the "going out" for its outward expression. The disciples understood this when He first said, "Come: follow me!" And they understood it better when He told them to begin at Jerusalem and girdle the world with the message of life. Christianity is not fulfilled in rapt contemplation, but in active participation. The ideal Christian is one whose life is hid in Christ, while every faculty he possesses is expanded in retrieving a lost world.

"Pasture" is spiritual sustenance. We are fed, both when we pray and when we praise. We "go in" to hear and "go out" to tell. So the getting is counterbalanced by the giving, the instruction by the teaching, the courage by the fighting, the resting by the working. H. P. H.

Sharers in His Glory

THURSDAY. John 12:23. "The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified." Only a few of His disciples had caught glimpses of this glory; the multitude did not begin to realize Christ's true greatness. The hour had not yet come for its revelation until the Greeks cried, "Sir, we would see Jesus!" Like the corn or wheat in the ground, His death was to be His glory. Calvary was to loom greater than creation's morning, or Bethlehem's manger. It was eternal love dying for the creature. No summit in eternity will rise loftier than the Cross. The crescent pales and perishes before the "name above every name," the crown above every crown. His humiliation is exaltation; after His death, the glory He had with the Father before the world was discontinued.

His glory becomes ours through faith in Him and His heaven our home.

He Who had the keys of the gates of death opened them on the heavenward side; yea, Samson-like, carried the gates away upon His shoulders! His triumph over death, hell and the grave, is His mightiest achievement.

It is love laying down its life not for friends, but for enemies, washing out their stains into purity, their hate into love, their debt and penalty into freedom and friendship forever. The joy arising from His glory was in beholding the millions of the redeemed returning to the heavenly Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, when sorrow and sighing hath fled away. E. W. C.

The Grandest Oratorio

FRIDAY. II Pet. 1:21. "As moved by the spirit." The Bible is a volume made up of sixty-six books, on a large variety of themes under the general head of religion; the work of more than forty writers of various nationalities, speaking divers tongues, and writing at intervals along a period of sixteen hundred years. And the volume thus composed is such a homogeneous unit that it has furnished the world with a universally accepted system of ethics and a system of doctrine which, whether rejected or accepted, is conceded to be consistent and harmonious from beginning to end.

Shall this be called a mere coincidence? I say it is more difficult to accept that view than it is to believe in inspiration. If forty persons of different tongues, temperaments and degrees of musical culture were to pass through the organ loft of a Church at long intervals and strike sixty-six notes on the keyboard, which, when combined, should yield the theme of the grandest oratorio that ever was heard, would not the man who regarded that as a mere fortuitous happening be regarded, by universal consent, as a foolish man? The only possible explanation would be that one Tone-master was in control. Thus did holy men write as they were moved by the Spirit of God. D. J. B.

False Hope

SATURDAY. Job 8:14. "Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be as a spider's web." The world is full of hope of various kinds. Alike in the dreams of childhood, the resolves of youth, the purposes of manhood, and the more chastened anticipations of old age, we may see its powers displayed. The faculty of hope is a great motive force of human action. False hope, Job declares, is as a spider's web. Such webs are often beautiful as we behold them sparkling in the sunlight. Fair in external appearance are the hopes which even the impenitent cherish. The power of hope will often enable a man who is entirely destitute of the grace of God, to paint the future in roseate hues; to dream dreams of possible excellence, and to call up visions of the glory of heaven, which, though unsubstantial as the gossamer of a spider's web, are not without their attractive features. It is well known that spiders produce from their own bodies the glutinous fluid with which they form their web. Even so the hopes in which the sinful indulge are self-produced. They rest upon no solid basis of God's word for support. They have no divine origin.

How slight and strengthless is the spider's web! The fall of a leaf will destroy it, a gust of wind will sweep it away. So the man who rests his hopes in the efficacy of sacraments or the virtue of mere formalism, or outward morality, as furnishing in themselves sufficient grounds for the divine approval, shall surely be, according to the Master's teaching, and as Job declared, among those "Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be as a spider's web." W. S. S.

Among Christian Workers

EVANGELIST John Goode, of the Bowery Mission, New York, has just returned from a successful preaching tour in the Western States. He spoke to large audiences in the churches and everywhere met a cordial welcome. His eventful career, his ultimate conversion and the experiences of his subsequent years of activity in the Gospel harvest field made a deep impression upon thousands of those who heard him tell his story. Churches and allied organizations desiring to be included in Mr. Goode's next itinerary should address him care of the Christian Herald, New York City.

Evangelist A. Sheldrick, well-known as a successful Gospel worker in Great Britain and the United States, is returning to England after more than fifteen years' sojourn here. In 1905 the late Dr. Klopsch invited Mr. Sheldrick to this country, where he has since been actively associated with many prominent evangelists. After he had spent seven years here, he returned to England for a brief vacation with Gipsy Smith, with whom he traveled twenty thousand miles in two years. Mr. Sheldrick is the author of several books on prophecy.

John H. Wyburn, for several years Superintendent of the Bowery Mission and since 1906 head of the McAuley Water Street Mission, recently passed away after a short illness. Mr. Wyburn was converted in the Water Street Mission in 1888, during the superintendency of the well-known rescue worker, Samuel H. Hadley. He was greatly beloved and was known as one of the most devoted and successful workers among fallen men.

U. S. ROYAL CORD

A famous tire—a famous tread. Acknowledged among motorists and dealers alike as the world's foremost example of Cord tire building. Always delivering the same repeated economy, tire after tire, and season after season. The stripe around the side-walls is registered as a trade mark in the U. S. Patent Office.

With every tire priced at true worth, what need would there be for "discounts"

BUSINESS concerns may be divided roughly into two classes.

One goes on the idea that the public doesn't think much. The other believes that public good sense makes the right decision nine times out of ten.

Concern No. 1 likes to keep away from facts. Concern No. 2 is anxious to place all the facts possible before people.

It is interesting to watch these conflicting methods working out in the tire industry.

* * *

Eighteen months ago the makers of U. S. Royal Cord Tires put themselves on record against the unsoundness of the "discount" way of selling tires.

Going right ahead and making the par quality tire at a net price.

Opposing the confusion of "so much off list." Because list prices don't mean anything until the real worth of the tire itself is proven. Because "discounts" mean still less when list price has no relation to value.

Now it is evident the public hasn't been backward in finding out the truth.

* * *

Rising above all the uncertainty of "discount" appeal comes the clear, sharp public opinion in favor of U. S. Royal Cords.

More dealers by 36% than a year ago. In May 1921 alone an increase in sales of U. S. Royal Cords of more than 25% over May 1920.

Car-owners know more than they let on. They are letting the "discount" situation run its course.

And turning to U. S. Royal Cords as the par quality tire at a net price.

The most significant thing that is happening in tires today.

everywhere*

Why Speculate?

When Safe Investments Give Such Remarkably High Yields

By C. R. LEAKE

THE above heading was used for an article which appeared in the Christian Herald, November 6, 1920. It is just as pertinent today and when you consider that during 1920 nearly half a billion dollars was thrown away in "wild cat" stocks and it is figured that half of this sum at least was taken not from big city people but from those in small community centers, you will get some idea of the tremendous need of careful study and the best advice obtainable before investing a dollar.

It is conceded that those of us who live in small cities and towns have very few chances compared with our big city brother to make money quickly. It is done, of course, but it is the exception, and where a family is found with funds to invest it represents in most cases years of faithful work and, greater still, years of self-denial.

The turn of the half year is a reinvestment period for many. Mortgages fall due. Interest is due, perhaps on stocks or bonds purchased in the past, and again comes the question of how best to put these funds to work. It is unlikely that this generation will again see such bond investment bargains as are now available. How long they will be available is a question, as we are fast swinging back to normal, so the wise investor will put his money to work in long-time bonds at the unusually high rate of interest obtainable today just as quickly as he has made sure that he has chosen a sound investment.

There are bonds selling at a price today to yield 8 per cent. and when one stops to think a thousand-dollar bond bought today at 8 per cent. will in ten years double itself. Example: A First Mortgage Real Estate Bond may be bought which pays 8 per cent. or $40.00 each six months. If you invest this $40.00 at 6 per cent. as you collect it every six months it will amount to another $1,000 at the end of ten years. This is true of many bonds today and in most cases the same bonds on which investors a few years ago thought four per cent. interest a fair return.

A FEW questions come to mind that may quite naturally come to yours as you read this. From whom could I buy good bonds at this time? How could I be sure that the financial house is a safe one with which to deal? How could I get delivery of purchases without parting with funds in advance? If I haven't $1,000 at this time, how can I invest smaller amounts? I have interest of $40.00 that I would rather invest than run the chance of spending on unessentials; how is it to be done?

It is not so long ago that the large investment houses disregarded the existence of the small investor entirely. Most of them were catering to the demand for large blocks of securities by trust companies, banks and insurance companies and a selected list of individuals who were known to buy in large amounts. Conditions have changed. The leading investment houses report average sales of $1,000 where in pre-war days they reported their averages at twenty to thirty thousand. The small investor was compelled to depend on the small and little-known investment house and did not enjoy the sense of security that his wealthy brother had in dealing with the well-known investment firm. The financial houses advertising in the Christian Herald are recognized as ones of high standing, and it's a good time to state that inquiries to our free booklet column are sent by us to firms who have stated their willingness to correspond direct with the subscriber, and in all cases you may be sure they are well known and conservative investment brokers.

How often one is requested to send money in advance for all sorts of articles that one buys and just as often one feels the injustice of paying before examining the article. You may invest, however, by instructing your investment broker to send securities direct to your local banker, draft attached, and you need not pay for them until you completely satisfy yourself that the transaction is to your entire liking. For many years the small-town banker was looked upon as an insurmountable barrier, but in most cases he was right in advising local investment where his friends and neighbors could actually see just what they invested in. He knew that the better class of investment house had little time for the development of this market and it was left wide open for the men who sold "gold bricks." Conditions for him have changed, too. He realizes his opportunity to help in the development of our tremendous resources for the benefit of all rather than the few.

It is perfectly natural for us to have broader views and take a more active part in American life if we have funds invested in an enterprise of national scope. The Liberty Loans more than any other thing, I think, made for unity and made possible the greatest army the world ever saw trained and on foreign soil in a little more than a year. It is just as great a duty today to save and invest as our national progress absolutely depends on it.

THERE are many good houses that we can recommend through which you can buy any bond you may decide upon on the partial-payment plan. In most cases you receive six per cent. on all monies paid in and receive your bond when fully paid for. You do not lose funds paid in, in case of your being unable to continue payments. We are glad at all times to advise with you, both as regards your selection of a financial house and your selection of investment. For many years a man or woman's investments, for some unknown reason, were considered a big secret. It was a "break" to ask one where his funds were at work. I suppose the real reason for this came into being originally because people made such horrible investments and in a great many cases used such terrible judgment they were ashamed of themselves. This is all changed now—it's a subject of interest to the entire family, and most people now talk it over frankly with their friends and their banker, as one cannot learn too much in regard to proper safeguards of his principal. Nothing so saps our national life as the losing in unfortunate investments, that which usually represents toil and thrift and sometimes the work of a lifetime, not only the work of the bread winner but that of the family. Thrift as practised in the American Home today actually is the backbone of this country.

If you want to invest for a few years rather than for a long period short-term notes are ideal investments. Many persons have improvements to make but are putting them off until prices are within the amounts they wish to spend, and these funds can be put to work at good interest in the meantime to yield as high as nine per cent., and you may select notes that are payable in one, two, or three years from now.

Consider first of all in making selections of notes or bonds safety, and you of course will select those investments that are best suited to your personal needs. Don't be afraid to seek advice from those who have sound business judgment and are in a position to know, then when you have decided again, go back to your first consideration of safety. Don't take a chance when safe investments are selling at bargain prices and will give you an interest return that is considerably higher than we shall see again in this generation. Money rates are bound to be reduced within a comparatively short time and our opportunities for safety and six to eight per cent. will be over.

We again ask "Why Speculate?"

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/2%.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Barnsdall Corporation, 5 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold bonds to yield about 9 per cent. own and operate properties in 14 States. Total net assets 377 per cent. of this issue. Circular 40.

Saul, the Pharisee

International Sunday-School Lesson for July 10

Acts 7:54-8:3; 22:3, 4; 26:5, 9, 10

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

WHEN the small boy ran into a saloon and told the bartender that his sign had fallen down, he was a real philosopher. The dispenser of alcoholic poison came to the door and discovered that a drunken man lay on the sidewalk. That man, however, was the product of the saloon and in the truest sense its sign. "What is the product of your school of thinking?" is always a fair test of any sect, philosophy or religion. Saul boasted in his early days that he was a Pharisee. In his later years he freely admitted his early pharisaism, but not with the same pride. Pharisaism produced the death of Stephen. Martyrdom was the outcome of such vicious thinking.

Turn to your Bible dictionary for a general statement concerning "Pharisees." Every Bible student needs some books for continuous reference. "A Dictionary of the Bible," by John D. Davis, is one of the best in a single volume. Buy a book a year for Bible study if you cannot purchase one each month.

In Christ's days there were three Jewish sects: Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes. Many beliefs of the Pharisees were right, such as immortality of the soul, resurrection of the dead, existence of spirits, rewards and punishments in the next world. Then the Pharisee said that religion consisted in an exact conformity to the law. They made religion an external matter, rather than of the heart. In addition to the law as given in the Old Testament there were many interpretations made by the Pharisees, and these were also binding on the sect. Self-righteousness, hypocrisy, over attention to minutia and neglect of essentials were outcomes of this school of reasoning. They were ready to use harsh force to make others conform. Men of high standing, such as Gamaliel, the teacher of Paul, are numbered among the Pharisees.

"The Church owes Paul to the prayer of Stephen," said Augustine. In this respect Stephen is like Andrew, who hunted up his own brother, Peter, and brought him to Jesus Christ, who became his Saviour. The fact of Saul's complicity in the death of Stephen is awful, and Saul could never unrelate himself to that martyrdom. The look of Stephen could never be forgotten. Saul may not have been active in actually casting the death-dealing stones upon Stephen, the man with the heavenly-radiant face, but he was ready to care for the garments of the murderers. His zeal to make conformists caused him to give the vote of death with a clear conscience. He soon became so expert as a heresy hunter and so brutal in his methods of arrest, that he was made one of the chief detectives of so-called unbelief, going even to Damascus for his prey. He became so unconscionable, or conscientious, according to the viewpoint, that even women were arrested by his orders when he found them "in the way." Unknown to himself, this Pharisee was so enshackling his life that there could be no power of release except by a miracle, which could be performed only by the Lord Jesus Christ.

SAUL was very conscientious, but absolutely wrong. Many are still declaring that their acts are right if their conscience does not condemn them. Conscience within us sits as a judge, but judgment can be partial. Absolute truth must be the standard by which right decisions are made. Pilate asked Jesus: "What is truth?" but he did not tarry for the answer from the only One who could always give the positive and final answer.

Henry Clay Trumbull said: "Conscience tells us that we ought to do right, but it does not tell us what right is—that we are taught in God's Word." Edwards declared: "As the sun dial cannot make known the hour when the sun does not shine on it, so conscience is not a plain or safe guide to duty unless it is enlightened by God's Word." Conscience can be so seared, as by a hot iron, that it ceases to act and to react under the blessed influences of the Holy Spirit. Ships with good compasses and careful captains have been wrecked because the needle was deflected by unknown deposits of metal.

Saul's pharisaism was leading him into continuous sins. Nothing less than the infinite power of God could set him free. His conscience could not be trusted. Saul was doing more harm to himself than he did to Stephen. Stephen could see the opened Heaven "and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God," but Saul was not able to even see the gates of hell toward which he was hastening.

While Paul is our central character for study during the coming months, we will have numerous opportunities of making character studies of others also. Special attention should be given to the first Christian martyr—Stephen. He is soon following in the footsteps of his Master, as he goes to death at the hands of those who would destroy Christianity by killing believers and leaders. Multitudes of others have joined that great army of martyrs, and still others are to be numbered among those who will have kept the faith regardless. Read, with careful meditation, the concluding verses of Acts 7. The world needs more Christians with the shining face which comes from beholding the Triune God. Moses is the typical one in the Old Testament and Stephen in the New. Who is the teacher, the man or woman, boy or girl, whose face is just glorious from knowing and seeing God? Is yours thus radiant?

PERSECUTIONS have come upon the Church in every age. At times the barbarity has been more severe, as was the condition following the death of Stephen. The members were scattered and they went forth, not in silence, but as preachers of the soul-saving Gospel. These persecutions helped them to obey more fully the Great Commission. The Church grew.

Korean Christians have had their sad but glorious experiences in recent months, but the Korean Church is more a praying church today than ever before. The world should watch intently for the news about that church, during this second year in their special series of three years of concerted and directed activity.

The products of pharisaism and Christianity can be contrasted in the barbarity of Saul and the loving-kindness of Stephen, who, as he was in the midst of his great suffering, kneeled down and prayed like unto his Master at Golgotha, "Lay not this sin to their charge." This also was the prayer of Miss Edith Cavell, when about to give up her life in Belgium. In our Lord's Prayer we ask for pardon just in proportion as we forgive others who have wronged us—"Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors."

Saul was forgiven by the grace of God, but his acts were forever written on the pages of his life. Years after, when in Caesarea, and addressing King Agrippa II, he must needs tell the story of those earlier years. Young people often say, when they wish license, liberty and undue freedom, "This will not count." But it always does and wild oats persist in bearing fruit, often with heart-breaking surprises.

Two books are suggested for special study in addition to those named last week: "The Christian According to Paul," John T. Faris, and "Paul in Everyday Life," John Douglas Adam. Both books give a section each day for thirteen weeks. The two books will therefore be valuable in covering the time of the six months studies in the life of Paul.

HEART STORIES

A NEW BOOK OF SEVEN STORIES

By Dr. Charles M. Sheldon
author of "IN HIS STEPS"

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled, 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the "Good Fight," who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold in "As Heaven Views It," whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in "Why the Minister Remained"; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in "Of Such Is the Kingdom" and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; "Sunrise on the Mesa" is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; "His Christmas Gift" is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled "Guests of Honor," in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, "In His Steps," should read this new book.

Young People's Topics for July 10

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Living Close to Christ

E. L., 1 John 3:18-24; John 15:7-10

THE complexities and bewilderingments of life make it necessary to live close to Jesus Christ. In the midst of the puzzlements and distractions of the times He is the Way, the Truth and the Light. There are many ways that are false. The innumerable religions are a witness to that fact. The only safe way is the religion of Jesus Christ. It is impossible to go astray, become lost in the far country, get turned round in the fog of materialism if one stays close to Jesus. There are so many teachings today that one is prone to become more and more confused [the further they are investigated. But Jesus Christ is the teacher of the truth of God and nothing but the truth of God. There are all sorts and conditions of lights burning, but they are all will-o'-the-wisps that lead to miry bogs and pitfalls. Jesus Christ is the true Light, the light of the world, the only light the world needs for mental guidance. The great questions of the day concerning individuals and nations are solved when He speaks and His teaching is obeyed to the letter. These facts are as old as Christianity itself.

Others need that we live close to Jesus Christ. For multitudes whom no man can number there is much mystery in life. Life itself is a mystery to all who know not God and His love as revealed in His Son. There is the mystery of sorrow, of temptation, the mystery of failure. Unless they learn how to interpret these in the light of the teaching of Jesus they are helpless and baffled. Have we, as Christians any message for those who are the victims of the Christless life? Are we living close to the Master of Life? If not then are we and the world great losers. If we are not living close to Jesus Christ because we do not know how to live close to Him, let us listen to the author of our references. John lived close to Jesus Christ. He will tell us how to do it.

What Is Our Reasonable Service

B. Y. P. U. and C. E. Rom. 12:1-8

OUR reasonable service is to present our bodies a living sacrifice, says Paul. Paul was not a seeker for death. He was willing to die whenever God said so. Sometimes death may come in the expression of duty and the path of service, but it is not right to die until God is willing. Some years ago General Nogi of Japan took his life to show his devotion to the emperor. But our Emperor does not wish us to do that.

Certain devotees of religion used to think the way to serve God was by fasting, by the infliction of wounds, by giving up to death. That is not a reasonable service. On the contrary it is exceedingly unreasonable. The real Christian is not a mutilated or amputated person. The real Christian is a dedicated person. Think of the false religions of the world. Think of men and women bowing down to reptiles, idols of stone, crocodiles and frogs, offering themselves to fire and water to be burned and drowned—the whole thing is unreasonable. It is not necessary to suffer in order to be a martyr. If a follower of the Master is not a martyr before he dies he is not likely to be a martyr after death. A martyr is one who is willing to die if that is necessary, if God so wills, if in bearing witness to the truth, his life is taken. But the reasonable service that God asks is that that plunges into the work of the kingdom, not with the thought of dying but with the thought of doing good. Lyman Abbott said, "Christian sacrifice is a consecration, not a destruction." Mrs. Browning said, "Free men freely work, whoever fears God, fears to sit at ease."

Our living bodies, used in the service of God, that is the ideal. Every muscle that is used and tightened by the use in service to God, spells spiritual service rendered to our fellow men. God wants us to use our animal strength, not in the halls of pleasure and vanity fair, but in the arena of ministry and kindly deeds.

owing to the activity of the Jews, and urged the governments of the Christian nations to appeal to the League of Nations for a definition of the British mandate in Palestine. He accused the Jews of "taking advantage of the sufferings of the inhabitants due to the war" and deplored "the privileged position enjoyed by the Jews in Palestine, which is dangerous for Christians."

REV. DR. J. B. GAMBRELL DIES. Rev. Dr. James Bruton Gambrell, famous educator, editor and for four years President of the Southern Baptist Convention, died in Texas at the age of 79. Funeral services were held in the First Baptist Church of Dallas. After serving in the Confederate army with the rank of Captain, he was ordained in 1867 and rapidly achieved prominence in religious work. He retained his strength and energy to the end and only a year ago, while still president of the Southern Convention, made a journey through Europe strengthening and encouraging Baptist activities.

LABOR FEDERATION IN SESSION. The American Federation of Labor is holding its annual convention in Denver, with resolutions by Irish sympathizers calling for a boycott on British goods and for American recognition of Ireland, promising to cause bitter discussion. Samuel Gompers, in his opening address, called for closer alliance and co-operations between organized labor and the farmers "in order that we shall not be crushed by the reaction of industrial captains or princes of finance."

ARMS HIDDEN ON SHIP ARE SEIZED. Several hundred machine guns believed to have been destined for the Sinn Fein in Ireland were found hidden in the coal bunkers of a steamship at Hoboken and were taken in charge by Federal officials.

NEW AMERICAN LEGION HEAD CHOSEN. The National Executive Committee of the American Legion has elected John G. Emery, of Grand Rapids, Mich., to succeed the late Colonel Frederick W. Galbraith, Jr., as the Legion's national commander. Major Emery, who had been vice-commander, went to France in the fall of 1917 and participated in several battles.

C. E. WOODS TO BE AMBASSADOR TO SLAIN. President Harding has decided on Cyrus E. Woods, secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for the post of Ambassador to Spain. Mr. Woods was Minister to Portugal from 1910 to 1913.

ADMIRAL SIMS RETURNING HOME. Rear Admiral William S. Sims has cabled to Secretary Denby an acknowledgment of an order cutting short his leave of absence and directing him to report to the Secretary immediately upon his arrival in Washington and has left London to take ship at Southampton. He has made nothing approaching a retraction of his London speech attacking Sinn Fein propagandists in America, which caused such a wave of discussion, favorable and unfavorable, in this country.

RIOTING AT GOMEZ FUNERAL. Three persons were killed and ten seriously injured in Havana when a stampede of many thousands followed a clash between the police and rioters at the funeral of General Jose Miguel Gomez, former president of Cuba and for years a storm center in the island's politics.

SENATE PASSES HOUSE PACKER BILL. The House bill for the regulation of the meat packing industry was passed by the Senate by a vote of 34 to 31, following the rejection of the Senate's measure on the subject.

Questions and Answers

N. O. F., St. Croix Falls, Wis., writes a most interesting letter on conditions that exist in many modern churches. She says: "What we need is union. People are heartsick for Christianity, not sectarianism in antagonistic camps. The temples of God have been guarded by self-appointed gatekeepers. They cull out those they consider undesirable associates for their children, thus making for the church a social standard. If a poorer church is nearby, their leaders hold out the invitation, 'All can come; nobody is too poor or low; all are welcome.' Result: hardly any one comes. People who find themselves barred out of church seldom go back. They have really slipped farther down the ladder, and instead of humbly coming back, they blame those who put the stumbling-block in their way. Oh! if Christians could only realize what is depending on them today, and throw away their pride and come together in the name of Christ, for service, the whitening fields would yield a wonderful harvest. People are hungry for a crumb of real Christian fellowship. Asking bread, shall we give them a stone? A smile can change the whole atmosphere of a day. How and where do we give them?"

"Patty," Oldwick, N. J. The old campaign verses are not in our collection. For the words of the hymn, "O Sing to Me of Heaven," write to Biglow & Main, New York, who may have it in some of their hymn books.

E. W., Madison, Fla. Home and Foreign Missions are both important. The Home call must never be neglected in our enthusiasm for Gospel work in distant lands. With over 100,000,000 population, less than half of them members of churches, it must be clear to any mind that there is a vast missionary work calling us right at our own doors. What the denominations are doing in both fields can be learned from their latest annual reports which you can procure by writing to the secretaries.

E. W., Shawnee, Wyo., writes telling of a Sunday-school class of boys whose members left, not waiting for dismissal, and played a match game of baseball on vacant lots near the Sunday-school building. The writer suggests that employers should give the boys the Saturday half-holiday, which might be the means of stopping Sunday desecration.

Among the many letters we have received, discussing the question of "Age in the Ministry," the following from Rev. E. R. Carswell of Greencastle, Ind., has specially interested us, as it will doubtless interest Mail-Bag readers: "The writer is now founding out his fifty years in the ministry. Your question of 'Age in the Ministry' recalls a heated discussion, when I was in my first and second pastorates—in the early twenties. A prominent minister of Alabama lost his temper over the discussion. As a boy preacher, I wrote an article defending our ministers of maturer years, and part of my reward was a personal letter from my beloved preceptor in the seminary, Dr. John A. Broadus, thanking me and expressing the judgment that the article would do good. The gist of the thought was that years are not to be considered, except favorably; that ripe apples are the kind to eat; that the churches and younger preachers can not afford to forfeit the wisdom and helpfulness of our fathers who have grown old in the harness, but retained their vigor and freshness and pliability in service; and that it surely will be the preacher's own fault, if he is laid aside, just because his locks are silvered and the years pile up on him. At least, that it should be so—that the churches should rather seek out men of matured knowledge and richness of experience, and that the churches needed to dread far more the clerical novice than the inefficiency of mature ministerial character. These sentiments, penned when a boy, are endorsed by the man of fifty years in the ministry. At 71, the boys and girls, young brethren and sisters are still my pals. There are others. When I was a boy preacher, I honored and valued and learned from the brethren of age and ripeness in knowledge and experience. Now that my years class me with the fathers, I love and pet and encourage the boys in the ministry. And, sad to say, it has come to be a real issue these last decadent years. There is a craze for inexperienced fledglings, and a tendency to shelve the men of years. More than the old preachers, the churches and the cause will be the losers by this suicidal exchange. Allow the young men time to grow naturally and safely into wisdom, while we utilize to the last days of life, the precious men of God who have kept to their tasks through long years, and proven God's faithfulness through experiences that have ranged the whole scale and played the entire gamut. The writer, when 24, rode forty miles in a buggy to have a dying minister of 80, who could not read for years after he began preaching—old Bobby King of South Carolina—lay his hands on his head and ask God's blessing."

Reader, Tarrytown, N. Y. According to the statistics of the World's Sunday School Association, there are in the whole world 27,709,700 Sunday-school pupils with 2,586,825 teachers. North America has 17,065,061 pupils and 1,697,820 teachers, Europe 7,943,440 pupils and 680,189 teachers.

J. M. B., Cincinnati, O. The bond of loving friendship in Gospel work which existed between Dr. Chapman and Charles M. Alexander, the singing evangelist, was an unusually strong one. When Alexander lay dying, he desired that the chorus of the hymn, "One Day," written by Dr. Chapman, and which he had so often led choirs in singing, should be engraved on his own tombstone. The verse he chose was:

"Living, He loved me; dying, He saved me;
Buried, He carried my sins far away;
Rising, He justified freely forever;
One day He's coming—O glorious day!"

Mrs. K. E. J., Navasota, Tex. There is no organization on earth that has done so much for suffering humanity as the Church. It has been at the front of every great work of charity and helpfulness throughout the centuries and has done incalculable good.

P. B., Auburn, Wash. This journal was the first to send relief to the people of the suffering European nations. It had relief work conducted by committees in France, Belgium, Austria, Germany, Poland, Turkey, Serbia, the Near East, and several others (including aid for war refugees in England and Holland), and continued the work until war conditions made further efforts impossible in Serbia, Germany, Poland and Austria. These operations included help to both friends and foes, recognizing that it is a Christian duty to make no distinction where the need of noncombatants—men, women, and children—was evident. America draws no line in its spirit of helpfulness.

E. L., Rockville, Ind., writes: "Rev. Benjamin Cox said in his sermon in the Christian Herald that the great need of America is, as far as possible, to take the 'sin' out of 'business.' The letter 'I' also occurs in the middle of 'business,' and how much better would it be to exalt the 'I.' 'I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life . . . I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me.' I suggest we uplift the great 'I Am' and 'sin' will not be so prominent."

J. K., Pueblo, Colo., writes: "If the United States would announce to the world that our policy from henceforth will be to reduce our army and navy to the minimum, building no more battleships, and that our efforts and our money would be used to further commerce and the establishment of friendly relations among the nations of the world, within ten years all the other nations would do likewise. Right always will triumph, and the only way to avoid future wars is to speedily bring all nations to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ. I believe a united effort on the part of the professed followers of Jesus, directed toward our Congressmen, would speedily bring this about."

Reader, Indianapolis, Ind. It is wrong to attribute to the Almighty afflictions that are due to violation or neglect of those physical laws which God has established, and which are everywhere operative and unescapable, the consequences falling sometimes on the innocent as well as the guilty.

How Henry Wilkinson Became Rich

Although never favored by fortune, Henry Wilkinson died well off. The small sums he was able to save never would have amounted to much but for a discovery Henry made of the power of compound interest. By a simple but unsuspected method Henry Wilkinson doubled his money and doubled it again.

Henry Wilkinson's system is not a secret. It has nothing to do with speculation. There is nothing left to chance or luck. It is a sound plan of investment which you or anyone else can follow.

Discussing Age in the Pulpit

A VERY wide response has been received commenting on the article which appeared in the Christian Herald of May 14, entitled "Age in the Pulpit," and propounding the question, "At what year does the minister's value to his parish begin to decline?"

The writer, who was well grounded in his subject, discussed the cases of several aged pastors who "had been laid aside," as too old for service. His vivid presentation of the whole question has awakened sympathetic interest, and many of the letters that have been received relate instances of faithful preachers who have labored successfully up to a certain age, when they have been dropped, owing apparently to the desire of the controlling interests in the church, to secure the services of a younger and "up-to-date" pastor. Some of these cases are peculiarly pathetic. Ministers with records of splendid service and who excelled as soul-winners and up-builders of Christian life and character, find themselves, with advancing years, churchless and unemployed, while young and inexperienced men, fresh from college and unequipped to take up the spiritual work they have laid down, are in their places.

Yet there are churches that appreciate the value of experience in the pulpit, and to whose members their pastor's gray hairs are not a signal for his dismissal. They have learned to love the man who has been the means of doing so much good and who has baptized them, and officiated at their marriages, and is now preaching, it may be, to the third generation. They do not find any weakening in Gospel presentation on account of accumulated years, but look upon the old minister, with his saintly kindness, his fatherly ways and his clear faith on the truths of the Gospel, as a reliable leader, a safe counselor and wise guide.

IT IS impossible to quote all of the letters, but we have made excerpts from a few which show the different viewpoints on the problem.

C. W. Q., East San Diego, Calif., writes: "I was deeply interested in the article on 'Age in the Pulpit.' I have been much surprised at the unreasonable (it seems to me) position that business men, as well as the Church authorities, have taken regarding the ability and usefulness of men past 40 and 50 years.

Our President usually is a man near to or past the sixtieth milestone, and his Chief Counselors 40 to 75; our Judges of the Supreme Court have always been 50 to 75; our Congressmen up to 80; our Bishops and the District Superintendents of our Churches are more of them above 60 than under—considering all these facts, what congruity, or I might say common sense, is there in concluding that the men in the lower positions, both in business, and religious followings, should be considered "down and out" if they are fortunate enough to live beyond 40 or 50? A large percentage of our successful business men achieved their success after they were 40.

"I have been a church attendant all my life, and my business has taken me to all the cities in the Union. Not being tied to any church, I have always made it a point to hear those who were considered the best. I do not consider myself egotistic in claiming to have an average judgment in such matters, and I can most conscientiously say that for efficiency and capacity in any direction his profession requires the average of the man over 50 outranks by a large percentage the average of those under that age.

"I am 80, and I know I am not yet in my dotage. On the contrary, I know my judgment on any business matters with which I am familiar was never so reliable as it is today. The modest means I have were accumulated since I was 60. I have made enough to have been wealthy, had I been less eager to 'get rich quick,' but did not 'get my eye teeth cut' until I was 60, when I began to see the folly of risky speculation. And I am not alone. I know many whose business judgment did not develop until they had passed 50. I also know many ministers of the Gospel who did not develop their best—intellectually, spiritually, and mentally—until they were past 50. I most sincerely hope that the Church authorities will soon realize that they are discarding the most useful religious teachers by putting so many men on the retired list who have just arrived at their stage of greatest usefulness in the cause of Christ."

H. K. E., of Beresford, Fla., sends this comment:

"I want to go on record as opposed to the great injustice that is being done the elderly ministers of our land. Youth can not make up for experience and devotion, and the churches suffer from the gross mistreatment that many old ministers receive because they are misunderstood. Their consecrated lives are not appreciated by people who, if they pray at all, say 'My will first, O Lord,' and object to the presence of a consecrated, aged man, who will fearlessly but tactfully tell them of their shortcomings and boldly pray for their reform.

"This turning out of aged pastors is not for the lack of ability, for in pastoral work, added years of experience cannot but add to efficiency, and to faith in God and love for God's creatures. The fault, I believe, is in the pride of self-willed people. The thoughtful, considerate people of the churches ought to make their convictions on the subject known, instead of letting the 'hustlers' get in a 'showy' preacher, in the hope of attracting people to church. The Gospel message is in the Bible, and the preacher's message ought to come from his heart; and anybody knows that a heart that has lived through much, will and can present that message better than one who is new at the business."

O. A. M., of Miltonsburg, gives the viewpoint of the young minister in the following letter:

"The Christian Herald's article under the caption 'Age in the Pulpit' brought to mind a question of great import. I am a young minister, and it would seem reasonable if I would take the view that a young minister would be preferred to an old one. That, however, is not the case. While it is true that many old ministers are dead branches on the tree, we must recognize that just as great a number still have fire and energy. I believe that the aptness of ministers should be gauged, not by age, but by efficiency. A minister who has kept in touch with the times is more able to teach and console, with the experience of years and the knowledge of life that he has gained in energetic work as pastor of a flock. We must have young ministers to replace the ministers who are yearly called from their work here on earth. We need young ministers also in proportion to the growth of the Church; but if I were a layman, I believe I would prefer an older minister to a young minister when I wanted spiritual advice and comfort.

"I believe that a minister's usefulness does not end until he is physically and mentally incapable of performing the duties of a pastor. That time usually does not come until death. And the usefulness of many ministers does not end even at death. If this were not so, we would hardly expect theological students to study and follow the teachings of old ministers, as we find them in text books. When seeking for inspiration and advice in books written by men who were high up in age, and perhaps lived long ago under different environments than we do today, we always recognize the value of experience in old age."

ONE result of the Christian Herald's publication of the article in question has been the discovery of a number of places where pulpits and congregations are ready to welcome the old minister. One who has been recalled to active service writes us that he has recently become the pastor of a fine country church in Virginia, "with the prospect of having one or more contiguous churches to unite in forming a compact field of labor." Another, little more than middle-aged, found the church doors closed to him, but ultimately succeeded in obtaining a pastorate (he was then 57) into which he was welcomed by those who had the true spirit of Christ. He is now doing excellent work in his new field. Some of the letters disclose the fact that there are vacancies in different states, in localities where a minister of ripe experience and still fairly vigorous would be welcomed.

Several of the letters from unemployed pastors, at the request of the writers themselves, have been sent to the Christian Herald Prayer League and made subjects of special supplication. To this fact, as well as to the awakening consciousness of congregations without regular ministerial appointees, the old ministers attribute in great measure the success which has attended their appeals for recognition. The League will welcome every opportunity to help those who are still physically fit for service, to obtain a hearing, and if possible to open to them new opportunities for spiritual usefulness.

As Mont-Lawn Opens Its Doors

have stumbled upon traces of The Children's Paradise. Oftentimes there are only wee traces—but they are traces just the same. A snatch of hymn music here, a tablecloth there, a swept-up room and a neatly darned stocking reflect the subtle—but none the less potent—teachings of Mont-Lawn.

"Sure," a child will say, "I learned the hymn in th' Temple. I sing it t' my ma, evenin's, when she's tired. She says as how it rests her!" Or:

"They learned me t' be neat—t' not have holes in my clo'es or a dirty face. I like bein' clean better'n I like bein' dirty." Or:

"I'm showin' my folks at home how t' make our room look nicer. Where'd I learn—where d' ye s'pose? When I was to th' country it was so pretty that I jus' got t' love pretty things!"

That's it—the Mont-Lawn spirit. It thrills, it teaches, it breeds happiness. In this day of drives and over-sea charity, it is satisfyingly all-American. It gives our own a chance—a chance that they sorely need. And it gives our nation a chance, too, a chance to thrive and grow more healthily.

Even now the children are at Mont-Lawn. As you read this the doors will be swinging wide and they will be trooping in with smiles on their lips, and songs in their hearts, and little half-formulated prayers in their souls. They will be trooping in and the first chapter of a real story will be starting!

Yes, indeed, as Mont-Lawn opens its doors for the busy summer season it is a very important event that takes place. It isn't just the bidding of one guest to enter. Or of two guests, or of three, or of four. It means that, in a little over two months, nearly three thousand kiddies will be made supremely happy. It means that the lives of some children will be actually saved. And it means that the lives of hundreds of them will be entirely made over.

For as Mont-Lawn opens its doors, it seems that hearts have been opening, too—the kind hearts of kind people who are responsible for a bit of Heaven on earth!

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS

SOME 15,000 delegates to the convention of the World's Christian Endeavor are meeting in New York this week—15,000 representatives of the best of the world's young manhood and young womanhood consecrated to a Christian service of truth and justice, and good citizenship.

The Christian Herald bids them welcome to the city, and wishes for them a most profitable and inspiring meeting. Its home is open to them with all the facilities of its office freely placed at their disposal, and it calls attention in the periods of sight-seeing, to two distinctly Christian Herald enterprises that will well repay a visit.

The first of these, and the most easily reached, is the famous Bowery Mission at No. 227 the Bowery. This mission is the center of the Christian Herald Prayer League. It is the home also of the Brotherhood with its 30,000 members drawn from the ranks of the "down-and-outers" who have passed through the mission into a Christian life, and have become self-supporting, self-respecting and God-fearing men as a result of its influence. It is an institution unique in American religious and welfare history, and an inspection of it will prove a real source of inspiration.

Mont-Lawn, the Christian Herald Children's Home, on the other hand, makes its special appeal to the child-lover. A large estate on the Palisades of the Hudson at Nyack, an hour's ride from New York City, Mont-Lawn looks far up and down the great river and across it to the gorgeous Westchester hills. Supported almost entirely by Christian Herald readers, it welcomes and rebuilds from the crowded tenements of the city more than 3,000 children every summer. Dotting its wide rolling lawns are the chapel, library, swimming-pool, wading-pool, play ground, dining-hall, hospital and half a dozen light, breezy dormitories. The Home is literally the "Children's Paradise." It is open now, and if time will permit there is no more enjoyable excursion from the city than a trip up the Hudson to view its beauties and absorb some of the children's delight over their vacation in such surroundings. Mont-Lawn makes all its friends welcome!

These are but two of the Christian Herald's many interests and all the others are equally fascinating, equally constructive, and equally as important in our program for advancing the cause of the Kingdom through service. Our activities are developed through the same visions that have builded the Christian Endeavor; our goals are identical. We want youth and its enthusiasm in the Church; we want to harness its will to do things for Christ and Humanity; we want to encourage it and cheer it and support it in its fight for a militant church, for civic purity and for national righteousness.

And so, may Christian Endeavor, with God's help, increase vastly in strength and power.

Young People, Forty Years Ago and Now

An Optimistic Discussion of the Changes Christian Endeavor Has Seen

WHERE are the young people of forty years ago? Of one thing we are very sure—they are no longer young people. Whatever their geographical location, whatever their business, whatever their success or lack of it, it is certain that they are all middle-aged or beyond, some verging on elderliness.

One of the hardest things for us "oldsters" to realize is, not only that we are oldsters, but that the young people of today are very much such youngsters as we were forty years ago. Almost every week in the year, and frequently many times a week, I meet companies of young people, and, as I look over an audience of hundreds or thousands, I have to pinch myself to realize that I am almost seventy years old and that scarcely one in that audience was born when the first Christian Endeavor society was formed forty years ago; that I am speaking to a generation then unborn and unthought of.

Not many months ago, as I happened to be in Portland, Maine, two boys in that original society, who were thirteen or fourteen years old when they joined it, came to me and said they would like to have me come to their houses and consecrate to God's service their little grandchildren. It was a distinct shock to me to realize that so many years had passed since I knew these grandfathers as boys, and I could scarcely keep from saying, "Why, you are only boys, how can you have grandchildren?"

So gently and quietly does old Father Time steal away our years, and whiten our locks, and wrinkle our brows, before he grasps his sharp scythe and mows us down! Other people are growing old and having children and grandchildren, while we think we, in spite of the fact that we see our own children and grandchildren around us, have stood still, for we feel as young in mind and spirit, if not in our joints, as we did half a century ago.

Is not this an intimation of immortality? Something about us is growing old; there is no doubt about it. But there is also something that does not grow old. We are aging, and we are not aging. No one has put this better than St. Paul, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

BUT how about the young people of forty years ago and now? At the center of their being they are very much the same now as then, but their surroundings are different. In some respects this environment is better, in other respects worse.

It is better now in that forty years ago little official attention was paid to the young people of our churches. I do not mean to say that the pastors of the 70's and the 80's were not interested in their young people. Indeed they were. They prayed for them, longed for their conversion, held meetings and classes for them, yet many had not discovered them. They did not believe in the seriousness of purpose, the depth of devotion, the capacity for organization and service of all kinds, which lay dormant in the hearts of the young. The old heresy that "young people should be seen and not heard" still prevailed. Everything was to be done for them, little could be done by them, was the prevalent opinion. They were preached to, lectured, taught, but were not set at work. Everything was done for impression, little for expression.

By

But the real concern of pastors and churches for the young folks was evident from the fact that within a very few years after the Christian Endeavor movement demonstrated its ability to set young people at some worth-while tasks for the church, to open their mouths in the prayer meeting, to organize them for multitudinous activities, tens of thousands of pastors said: "This is just what we want. We, too, will adopt this plan." They had been thinking and praying along these lines with the burden of the young people on their hearts, for years. They had been experimenting, very likely along the same lines; hence their eagerness to adopt the plans called Christian Endeavor in most denominations, and by some purely denominational name in a few others.

I have always felt that my part in the spread of the Christian Endeavor movement has been a comparatively small and a much over-estimated one, and that the credit for it is due to the thousands and thousands of pastors who were alert, broad-minded, not wedded too much to a desire for originality, who at once adopted and adapted to the needs of their own churches the Christian Endeavor idea.

IN THE matter of interdenominational fellowship, these days are a great improvement over those of forty years ago. I do not think that such a movement as Christian Endeavor could have arisen seventy-five years ago. I doubt if it could have come fifty years ago. But in the early 80's the churches, slowly and reluctantly at first, but with increasing intensity, began to feel the need of a larger, freer fellowship. The scandals of over-zealous sectarianism; the overchurched and underchurched communities, resulting from it; the waste of men and money in building the kingdom of God, more and more began to be realized.

A movement that promised at first to bring together the young people of all evangelical denominations in one organization for fellowship and inspiration, with a common pledge and common methods, while maintaining supreme allegiance to their own churches and denominations, was welcomed by multitudes. By some of course it was not welcomed, and the promise of those earliest days was not entirely fulfilled. Yet a wonderful fellowship among young Christians of a hundred denominations has resulted, and now great meetings of like-minded Christian youth, numbering from hundreds to tens of thousands, are so common that we think nothing of them, and take them as a matter of course.

It is true that many other organizations and influences have contributed to the present era of Christian fellowship, and for them all we thank God.

I was amused by the frank confession of an old minister whom I once heard in a public meeting describe his experience in his early ministry more than fifty years ago. Said he:

"When I was a young preacher, and I saw the fathers in Israel at the end of the pews growing sleepy and beginning to nod, I knew how to wake them up. I would give it to the Presbyterians, or I would pitch into the Campbellites. Then the old men would sit up and take notice, and when they went out, one would say to the other, 'Ain't our young minister smart?'"

Dr. Clark at the Christian Endeavor tree he helped to plant during the great convention in Washington in 1896

Thank God, I know of no church where today such a travesty of religion would be tolerated.

But though, in some respects, the conditions that surround our young people today are better than those of forty years ago, in other respects they are worse. At least it is harder now than then to maintain an earnest Christian life and constant activity in the Master's service. The public schools, especially the High Schools, have contributed their share to these difficulties. Secular education demands more and more the time and strength of the young people. The pupils are worked harder. The home study required is more onerous. Social activities in the schools are multiplied. Balls and smaller dances leading to late hours, weariness and distaste for religious duties are common.

The first society of Christian Endeavor held its meetings on a week-night for years, and the members of almost all the early societies gave one week-night to their prayer meeting and to planning for their committee service. Gradually the pressure of the schools and of social engagements became so heavy that one after another the societies yielded to it, and moved the meetings and many of the activities to a Sunday already crowded with other duties.

This seems inevitable, so long as our public schools seek first a secular and social education, and after that—a long way after—if there is any time left, the kingdom of God. The colleges set the pace and demand so much cramming for entrance that secondary and even primary schools, all the way down the line, have to speed up their curricula, often to the detriment of higher things.

BUT more than this, the lax social customs which have lately come in like a flood have put many young souls in peril, and reduced the temperature of their religious zeal. The many recent columns in the Literary Digest, devoted to extracts from hundreds of religious and secular papers all over the country, regarding the hideous evils of the modern sensual dance and many suggestive movie shows, should awaken all Christian people to this menace to the youth of this and future generations.

Forty years ago, though the Civil War, with its aftermath of laxness, was not very long past, even who as chairman of the Convention Committee is working hard to insure the success of the great Christian Endeavor gathering. He is the Commissioner of Immigration at the port of New York high society was comparatively modest, while ordinary social life was scarcely tainted by the glaring, sensuous evils of today. Then young people enjoyed homely, wholesome, health-giving, mind-quickening games, such as the sister of Theodore Roosevelt describes as played in their family circle. Now many young folks (I was tempted to write "most" instead of "many," but I hope that is not true) enjoy only the indecent dance in indecent clothes, to the most reckless and sensuous of jazz music, and in the fetid atmosphere of a public ball-room.

The decline of the mid-week prayer meeting is another deterrent to an earnest religious life among the young people of the churches. When a church gives it up, and the parents, and perhaps even the minister, show no concern for it, how can the young people be expected to think their own weekly meeting so important, or the service and the influences that flow from it, so vital to their growth in grace? Forty years ago an evangelical church was as much expected to maintain and sustain a weekly prayer meeting, as a preaching service.

THIS may be thought a dismal catalog of influences that today surround the young, to offset the brighter picture with which I began. But I would not end on the pessimistic key. Obstacles are things to be overcome. Difficulties conquered, strengthen character. While many have yielded to the seductive evils of the day which, in a measure, inevitably follow such a war as we have witnessed, many have stood stronger, purer, for the test.

The Endeavor societies the country over, and the world over, are just closing at the time of the world's convention in New York, the best decade and the best year in the forty of their history. Never have I seen such conventions, local, county and state, as I have attended during the last twelve months. Never have the many letters from abroad been so full of good cheer or filled with stories of greater growth.

Religion in the young heart is ineradicable. Its expression is inevitable if it is given a chance. The Christian Endeavor movement is simply a channel to give it expression. All those who attend the meetings in New York on the memorable July days, the 6th to the 11th, or read about them, will admit that I have not exaggerated the hopeful side of the present day or the stalwart religious strength of a multitude of the present generation. Their songs, their prayers, their plans, their enthusiasms, their joy in their work and their organizations, even if sometimes hilarious, will show that religion is no past issue with the present generation, that the church at large today is teeming with young life, and that better things await the church of tomorrow.

"For Christ and the Church"

"FOR Christ and the Church!" It has a thrilling ring, that motto. It suggests old-world things—it makes one think of crusaders in shining armor going to do battle for the right. It makes one see a mental picture of knights, with burnished shields upraised; and of fair women with gentle, white hands. It makes one dream the greatest dream of all—the dream of sublime faith, and of the courage to stand for an ideal, and of the ability to fight for truth and righteousness. It is a splendid motto—a triumphant slogan. And the society that it stands for is a splendid and triumphant organization.

"For Christ and the Church!" Yes, it does suggest old-world things. It suggests old-world things like chivalry, and loyalty, and vanquished dragons—things that the modernists say are out of fashion. And yet I have no need to tell you what a thoroughly up-to-date society the Christian Endeavor is—it is not necessary to say here that it stands for the best things of this age and generation.

The Christian Endeavorers don't go charging across a broad plain, waving a cross-marked banner, and shouting their motto (That's the way the knights of yesterday would have done it!) They don't dash into the fray with their lances in readiness—not at all. They don't wear their brave slogan on a burnished shield. It isn't necessary. For every true Christian Endeavorer carries the watchword emblazoned upon his heart, and the reflection of it shines from his earnest eyes. Every true member of the society has come to a lasting realization of the meaning of chivalry and loyalty—every true member has slain the dragons of selfishness, and thoughtlessness, and conceit, and pettiness. It has proved—this band of sincere people—that certain world-old qualities are not out of fashion; and that those qualities can be strong and beautiful without the slightest touch of self-seeking, or of flamboyance.

"FOR Christ and the Church" is a mighty good rule to live by. It's easy to understand—there are no elaborate words or phrases to contend with—and its meaning stands out as brightly as though it were written (as it is) in letters of undying flame. "For Christ and the Church" is a motto that points a right path to every worth-while young man or woman—be they members of the organized Christian Endeavor Society or not. It's a motto that couldn't lead any clear thinking person astray.

In this age of complex things—of strange

The Motto of a Great Organization— and of Many Splendid Lives

theories and strange practices—it is rather wonderful to find a creed as simple as the creed of the Christian Endeavor. In this day of Freud and Einstein and Nietzsche it is as refreshing as a cool spring in a desert place. As our civilization marches on it sometimes seems that we are getting away a trifle from the simple things—that we are going in, with more and more intensity, for the involved processes and the intricate ways of thought. For that reason alone the motto of the Christian Endeavor is decidedly worth-while. For that reason the motto stands out, as violets and field daisies do, in the forced, too-warm window of a city florist's shop. It's like hearing the little prayer that you learned at your mother's knee rising from the hurry and bustle of a crowded street!

The World Convention—1921

By Margaret E. Sangster

MARCHING together, by hundreds they come,
Bound by the strength of a wonderful love;
Under the banner of Church and of right,
Led by the Father who smiles from above.
Christian Endeavor, no legions could sever,
All of the ties of the heart and the soul—
Marching and singing, their faith they are bringing,
Up to the throne, which is ever their goal!

Nations are sending their brightest and best,
Far lands are praying as onward they pass;
Under the watchword "For Christ and the Church"
Thousands together, a soul-stirring mass!
Christian Endeavor, both now, and forever,
May they win through—as a part, and the whole,
Marching and singing, their voices go winging,
Up to God's Throne, which is ever their goal!

To be able to live for Christ—that is the aim and ambition of every Christian man and woman. Since the day when martyrs were burned at the stake—since the generation when men and women walked, with sure, unflinching step, into the arena filled with hungry lions—the ideal of a life for Christ has been the paramount ideal of the world. And now that the day of arenas is past, now that martyrs are very seldom burned at the stake to appease the blood-hunger of a heathen monarch, the same ideal is still the biggest thing in life. To live for Christ—and for the Church, which is his mouthpiece—is still the crowning glory!

It seems a simple thing to openly confess Christ, now, than it did in the days of the Caesars. Now that there is no death penalty involved it seems tremendously easy to "Live pure, speak true, right wrong, follow the King." For the ideal of Christ is not a hard one to follow—the laws set down by the Church are as simple as the motto of the Christian Endeavor Society. Just good fellowship, true friendship, kindness and tenderness; just the Golden Rule—that's all you need remember. Just the vision of the One Who was born in a manger, and who died on Calvary's hill.

"FOR Christ and the Church!" It has a thrilling ring—that motto. And it may well have. For it gives, very briefly, the foundation that every strong house of life should be built upon. It's a foundation that will never crumble away, that will never get shaky with age—that will never show crack, or strain, or unpleasantly jagged break. It's a foundation that will last as long as the house itself lasts—and longer! Chivalry, and loyalty, and vanquished dragons—they're all in back of the five words that go to make the Christian Endeavor motto. The best of the old-world and the best of the new are brought together in it.

The Christian Endeavorers don't go charging across a broad plain, waving a cross-marked banner and shouting their glorious motto. They don't wear vivid armor, and they don't go upon crusades (as the knights of old would have done). Instead, they go quietly and simply upon their way helping others along the road of life, being friendly, and upright, and good comrades. And, because they are so unassuming, and withal so unaffected in the beauty of their faith, they fulfil the deepest meaning of their motto and, in so doing, make better the church and the community of which they are a part.

Christian Endeavor—An Open Door

A Glance at the Opportunities Confronting the New York Convention

WHAT will "New York 1921"—the Sixth World's Convention of the Christian Endeavor Movement—sound as the rallying call for the young people of the Church?

At the Atlantic City International Christian Endeavor Convention in 1911, ten thousand Christian Endeavorers accepted the challenge of their leaders and went back to their communities with the fighting slogan: "A Saloonless Nation by 1920." It was little more than a dream, then. Indeed, it was greeted not only by the laughter of the secular press, but by the warnings of many religious journals who felt that youthful enthusiasm had been led astray. But the slogan quickly captured the imagination of the temperance forces of the country and very soon it was supported by far-reaching and comprehensive programs of activity. The young people themselves were in the forefront of the fight. In every state in the Union, they accepted tasks of responsibility.

"A Saloonless Nation by 1920" is now an incident of history and a fact of government, but the spirit of the battle-cry continues to be the spirit of the organization that gave it to the world. Certainly the possibilities of these four million young people of more than eighty thousand Christian Endeavor Societies may not be measured in an article, but in their own churches and in their own communities, they may be counted upon to play their part in every campaign for Christ and the Church.

As to Prohibition—the law enforcement campaigns are receiving the full support of Christian Endeavorers, and for the immediate future, citizenship conferences are being planned in which a carefully directed study of the whole program of Christian Citizenship will be revealed. Incidentally, it is of great interest to us all to discover that the young people of the churches are better equipped temperamentally than any others to direct some details of our plans for the Christian Americanization of those who come to us from other lands.

But in the Providence of God, New York will have a louder voice; a more compelling call than Atlantic City. Important as are the citizenship activities of Christian Endeavor, they represent but one department of the whole program of the Movement. The development of the work in the United States under the leadership of the United Society has assumed in recent years the proportions of a great Home Missionary advance. The South and the Southwest have been organized into departments in which states unable to care for themselves have been successfully related to the better established unions in their sister states. The larger unions of the East, Middle West, and Pacific Coast have strengthened their programs at all points. The various departments of the work—Intermediate, Junior, Quiet Hour, "Tenth Legion," etc.—have been developed in harmony with the total plan.

All of the work at home has been promoted in full realization of the fact that for the next decade, at least, Christian Endeavor progress overseas will very largely depend upon Christian Endeavor in the United States. While the United Society will be able to make only modest investments in other lands, the returns, already inspiring, promise to be increasingly large. The opportunities that "New York 1921" faces, are great and compelling.

The Greek Church in Russia is ready to receive Christian Endeavor. In more than ten thousand centers of this mighty communion the door is opened to our movement, and one of the leading ministers of New England is willing to give his life to the development of this unprecedented opportunity.

Europe, particularly in the region of the new-made republics, has seen a rebirth of Christian Endeavor. Finnish Endeavorers, upon receipt of a total contribution of $200, recently led a great revival in Esthonia and organized Latvia.

More societies were organized in Germany during and since the war than in twenty-five years preceding it.

China has doubled her societies in two years, and with only $3,000 additional financial support could enter every unoccupied province.

Mexico has petitioned the United Society of Christian Endeavor to finance a young people's leader for all the evangelical churches, and Dr. Clark has just visited the field and reported it "white for the harvest."

SOUTH AMERICA has been waiting for five years for us to supply Christian Endeavor leadership, and Mr. Guy Inman, Secretary of the Association for

By DANIEL A. POLING

Co-operation in Latin America, states that Christian Endeavor, of all religious organizations, has a unique opportunity in the continent of opportunity.

The Christian Endeavor Movement in this country has resulted in placing a full-time secretary in that exceedingly important territory.

The Christian Endeavor Movement in the United States is making possible the maintenance of the India Christian Endeavor Union with its more than 60,000 Endeavorers, twenty native secretaries, and an English general secretary who represents all the Protestant evangelical churches; the budget for this whole program is less than $3,000 annually.

During the past year, Christian Endeavor has extended its program into all unoccupied territory through the organization of federations which group together the states and districts not strong enough to maintain themselves.

The leadership of the Junior and Intermediate societies, the call to systematic giving through the Tenth Legion, the enrollment of Comrades of the Quiet Hour, the challenge to Christian citizenship, and a score of other vital programs all center in the United Society of Christian Endeavor, which is an inspirational dynamo for more than three million young Christians in the United States.

SOME denominational leaders have said that money invested in the United Society of Christian Endeavor goes farther than money contributed to any other similar project. Today, ten dollars paid into this treasury for world work means ten dollars sent to the field, for Christian Endeavor overhead is the lowest among all interdenominational societies and Christian Endeavor "volunteer help" is an outstanding feature of the movement.

No international movement has fewer employed secretaries, but the young people who are giving their time and money to make possible the carrying out of its plans, number thousands. There are in the United States alone more than sixteen hundred Christian Endeavor unions officered by unpaid workers.

The Alumni Department of the United Society, which was organized only five years ago, promises to make possible the carrying out of some plans that have been thus far neglected as the result of inadequate financial support. There are now more than two hundred local Alumni fellowships enrolling more than twelve thousand "old grads" of Christian Endeavor. These fellowships are bringing the former active Endeavorers into vital fellowship with the organization, and enabling them to pass on to young people throughout the world the blessings they themselves have received.

John R. Mott has expressed the spirit of the Christian Endeavor Movement in the following splendid sentences:

"The young people's society is no longer an experiment in the church. Experience has justified its existence. It is a vital part of church life and organization.

"It was inevitable twenty-five odd years ago that the young people's society movement should have been broken from an interdenominational basis into denominational groups. You could no more resist the tide of denominationalism than you could the onrushing tide of the sea.

"But it would seem to me, in these days when the spirit of Christian unity and interdenominational fellowship is coming to be so large among us, that the young people's movement generally ought to be the first to return to an interdenominational basis. I know of no movement, because of its spirit and history, more capable of being the basis of such a unity than the Christian Endeavor Movement."

AS THE servant of the churches, and with absolutely no governing functions, the United Society of Christian Endeavor seeks first to promote in each denomination that honor it with its confidence, the denominational ideals and plans for young men and young women, and then in the spirit of the prayer of the Master: "That they all may be won," it calls the Christian youth of the world to fellowship and united service in the tasks that are the common heritage and responsibility of all who follow Jesus Christ.

Convened in such a spirit, with opportunities so vast confronting it, shall it not be that the Sixth World's Christian Endeavor Convention with its fifteen or twenty thousand Christian Endeavor leaders gathered together from all lands—the largest interdenominational religious gathering of the decade, will radiate to all quarters of the globe streams of Christian fellowship and inspiration. Shall it not be that out of this mighty heart of Christian youth will come a veritable Christian Brotherhood of Nations?

Dr. Sheidon Discusses

Spiritual Power

1. It is like electricity; an exhaustless store, always on hand, waiting to be used.
2. It is not dependent on man-made theology or elaborate religious rituals.
3. Its sources are a clean, physical life, a love of prayer, a study of God's truth, a longing for the salvation of men, a hatred of injustice, a meditative and quiet mind, a faith in the Holy Ghost, and personal love of Jesus.
4. It is possible for every member of the church to draw from these sources.
5. But Spiritual Power cannot be found in an atmosphere of supreme love of money and pleasure.
6. What can Spiritual Power do? It can change wrong definitions of life and give the soul its supreme satisfaction.
7. It can quench doubt, revive faith, and restore the soul's confidence in the love of God.
8. It can make a church a place of reverent devotion, and fill its program with a passion to redeem.
9. If Spiritual Power is so great a thing, why does not the church have more of it?
10. Because it does not seek it where it may be found, and prefers earthly to heavenly power.
11. But we need this power in order to earn the right to be called the Master's disciples.
12. "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned." The world will never be saved until the church is spiritualized for the task.

try is heartily supporting the effort to organize an All-Canadian Christian Endeavor Union, and as the result of the assistance of the general organization eastern Canada is alive with new enthusiasm, and a field worker has been employed in Ontario; a special trip to Manitoba, financed by the United Society, me as I rode with my men. I tried to think where I could possibly have seen this charming waiting-maid before, and could only conclude my impression was mistaken.

WE CAME to the halting place for our mid-day meal, a fair spot overlooking some portion of the Valley of the Loire. Here madame elected to remain in her coach and I, presently withdrawing from my men, heard the voices of mistress and maid, though not able to or wishing to catch the words. It sounded, however, as though the girl was being persuaded and commanded to something in which she was not willing. Then the carriage door opened, and the maid looked to where I was standing, hesitated, and finally came toward me.

"Madame would sleep for awhile, and has given me permission to enjoy the view and the air," said the maid with a smile, which was bewitching because of her beauty, yet speaking as though such forwardness was not natural to her.

"Both the fine view and the fresh air may be better enjoyed in pleasant company," I answered.

"So I was thinking, monsieur," she replied with more self-confidence.

"Well, you will find my men pleasant, agreeable fellows, mademoiselle."

"Your men?" she questioned, the red flushing her delicate complexion.

"Yes: you can hear how merry they are," and as I spoke Jean's lusty voice sounded in a verse of a well-known song.

No smile of hers answered my laugh, and I continued—

"But though they are merry you will find them polite, as brave soldiers should be, and they will be delighted with your company."

"Thank you, monsieur; I do not desire such friends," she replied disdainfully, the red still glowing on her cheeks as she turned away.

"What is your name, my girl?"

Though my question was abrupt, she seemed to put a check upon the annoyance she had shown, and turned to answer with a curtesy.

"Désirée, if you please, monsieur."

"The name is very suitable, and pleases me well enough, so does the owner—save that she is too pretty for her station. And how long, Désirée, since waiting-maids have disdained the company of soldiers?"

SHE gave a startled look, but seemed reassured when she saw my bantering smile.

"Am I disdaining such company?" she retorted saucily.

"Ah, but—"

"You are not a common soldier, of course, monsieur. I am sensible of the honour you do me in speaking to me; you of the noblesse, and I of 'Ces canailles de domestiques,'" she said mockingly.

"If a noble sought conversation with a maid of your station, would you deem it for her good?"

"Ta, ta, ta," she exclaimed, flushing and angry. "If you have been at Court, monsieur, you have not yet fallen in with its manners."

"Have you been to Court yourself, Désirée?"

"No. I—that is—why do you ask?" she inquired as if in alarm.

"Because, although of the South, you speak without a trace of its patois."

"I—I have been a long while with madame," she murmured.

"Ah! that explains it, and there is no need for you to appear so confused over my simple questions. Still, your blushes make you look even more charming, Désirée, and if you will walk with me under the shade of the trees, I promise to make love to you as well as any gallant of the Court could do it."

"I do not wish you to make love to me," she said indignantly, the red glowing even more brightly than before.

"Pardon the mistake," I laughed. "But do not let it prevent us from walking together, for I will promise not to make love to you."

It was evident that it was her inclination to refuse; but as she looked towards the coach she changed her mind, and turned to accompany me. I related an amusing incident of adventure, not connected with my mission, with which I had met the day before.

"So I was thinking, Monsieur," she replied with more self-confidence

Her constraint quickly passed away, and she became as charming in manner as she was in appearance. Yet, though admitting her attraction, I was not so blinded by it as to fail to observe how, after a while, she carefully turned the conversation to the matter of my journey to Paris.

"You speak as though you were well acquainted with the object of my journey," I presently said.

"That is no wonder, since it was openly talked about at Nevers," she answered readily.

"What was said about it there?"

"It was said that the Cardinal-Duke had selected you, from all his officers, to bear a despatch of great importance to the King."

SOMEONE had certainly been indiscreet and, as I have already said, this had caused me some inconvenience; yet I did not now regret it, since the knowledge must give me consequence in Désirée's eyes. But she must have been quick to read what passed through my mind, for into those lovely eyes entered a gleam of mischief.

"And further some persons said—"

"What?"

"That they could not understand why his Eminence employed, upon a matter of such moment, one so youthful and inexperienced as M. Arnaud de Beaujolais."

"There are older and more experienced men who may have failed where I have so far succeeded," I replied a little nettled.

"The good luck of the novice, perhaps," she laughed.

"Others may credit me with some little skill and forethought, as well as good luck."

She laughed again, and I was foolish enough to feel annoyed.

"Have you spent much skill and forethought in concealing your precious despatch?" she asked teasingly.

"Those who have sought it have not yet found it," I said grimly.

"I wonder if I could guess where you carry it?"

"I cannot prevent you from trying."

"Will you tell me when I guess rightly?"

"I do not promise to do that," and at this she looked so disappointed that I further said, "Would it please you very much if I could tell you?"

"I have a woman's curiosity, of course; but I also wondered whether you would dare to tell me—whether you would be afraid."

"Both the fine view and the fresh air may be better enjoyed in pleasant company," I answered

FROM the very day of my leaving Avignon I found his Eminence had not warned me needlessly when he had told me that my journey would be beset by dangers of no uncommon sort. Twice had I, and the six trusty fellows I had chosen so carefully from my command, been attacked on the highway, once at night and once in the daytime. Then we had, by vigilance, escaped an ambush, and lastly there had been the affair of the supposed rich merchant of Ghent who, after a failure to corrupt my men with gold, had offered me, for a sight of the document I carried, a sum of money which would have gone far to restoring the fortunes of my house. Perhaps I was over merciful in letting this man go, on account of his pleading and his gray hairs, without the sound drubbing, or worse, which my fellows would have awarded him.

Had I not considered it no part of a soldier's duty to inquire into the why or wherefore when obeying a clear command, I should have wondered how it came to pass that so many knew I was bearing the despatch, and seemingly aware of its purport, which I was not. But I contented myself with the knowledge that I, one of the youngest officers of the Cardinal-Duke's guard, should have been chosen in a matter so important.

Then came my meeting with the Countess du Bartas at Nevers. At first I refused, with due courtesy, her request that I should escort her to Paris, whither we were bound. True his Eminence had told me, at starting, that speed on my errand was not so much a consideration as safe delivery of the despatch into the hands of his Majesty, yet I was naturally anxious to accomplish my mission without delay. But when the Countess produced a letter, signed by the King himself, giving her the right to demand the escort of any troop she might meet on her way, I had no choice but to obey.

Madame, however, who was a lady of mature age and haughty manner, did not appear to take my first refusal in good part, and I saw no more of her until, resuming our journey the next morning, I assisted her into the coach.

It was then I first properly beheld her maid, a slender, graceful creature who modestly hung her head. To her, in turn, I proffered assistance, whereupon she looked up, and I saw a face marvelously pretty, which I had a fancy I had seen somewhere before. There was a frightened look in her eyes, yet she gave me a smile which strangely thrilled me, and which haunted

"Afraid? Why, what could you do if you knew? I have a great mind— But I can trust you?"

"Tiens! I said you would be afraid."

SHE spoke in a tone of playful banter; but I saw signs of nervousness—the changing colour, unrest of the white, shapely hands.

"But can I trust you, Désirée?" and I sought to meet her eyes, but she would not.

"Why should you fear to do so?" she murmured.

"True. I have known you but a very short while, Désirée; yet I am sure that you are no Delilah. A maid like you would not cozen and coax a man to his ruin, therefore I will tell you, if you wish, where I keep the letter which bears the seal of the Cardinal-Duke."

"To your ruin, Monsieur?"

"Yes. I am now high in my master's favour; but he is without mercy to those who fail him. Still, since you have dared me—"

She shrank for a moment; then she forced herself to make a laughing reply.

"Yes; I dare you."

"Well, then, it is sewn in the lining of this cloak I am wearing."

I could not see her eyes, for she turned quickly away with a seeming carelessness.

"Ah! that is one of the hiding places I should have guessed, so your hiding place is not so clever after all," she laughed, with a merriment which appeared somewhat forced. Then she commenced talking about matters of another kind, keeping up a gaiety which I once or twice fancied was slightly hysterical.

As she thus chatted, she suddenly exclaimed upon the beauty of some wild flowers growing on a bank beset by brambles, and I climbed a few steps to secure the blossoms for her. As I descended I felt my cloak tearing. Désirée was so close to me that, for a moment, suspicion crossed my mind she had actually placed the briar on the place where I had indicated the letter was concealed. But I was quick to prevent the rent from being more than a very slight one, and I made concern over the pricking of one of her own dainty fingers, which she had tried to conceal.

At another halting-place on our day's journey, I had another conversation with Désirée, though she had then lost her high spirits.

ARRIVED at the inn where we were to lodge for the night, the Countess who now appeared in a better humour, invited me to sup with her. Désirée was with us being, Madame explained, more a companion than an ordinary maid, which might have accounted for her good speech and manners.

Soon after supper the Countess and her attendant retired. I did the same with little delay, leaving my cloak on the back of the chair, where I had thrown it when entering.

In my room, however, I sat, after putting out the light. Later, when all was quiet, I heard without surprise a light footstep pass my door, and in a little while I quietly descended to the room where we had supped. A light was burning, and I opened the door.

"Désirée!" I exclaimed in pretended astonishment.

She had risen to her feet, pale and agitated. On the table were needle and thread, also my cloak, which she had not time to replace.

"I—I have been mending your cloak, monsieur."

"So I see. It is very good of you; but why lose your beauty sleep when the morning would have done as well? Had I been of a suspicious nature, now, I might have thought that, taking advantage of my carelessness, you had designs upon my concealed papers. But no; here they are in the lining, and my faith in you is justified."

She shrank from me, her lovely face pale in the candle light as I laughingly rustled the papers, and she made no reply.

"Well, your industry must not go unrewarded," and I offered a piece of silver.

"No, no, monsieur."

"Ah, then your service, if not for money must be for love, and should be more suitably rewarded."

Before she could be aware, I took her in my arms, and implanted a kiss upon her cheek.

"How dare you, monsieur—how dare you?" she cried, her face flaming, her beautiful eyes darting indignant fires.

"Is it so very daring an act for a gentleman to kiss a pretty waiting-maid?" I laughed.

"Let me go instantly, monsieur, or I will raise the household upon you," she cried in a fierce whisper.

"I think not, my pretty one—truly named Désirée. A pretty maid must be taught not to play with edged tools."

"What—what do you mean?" she gasped, fear growing in her wide-opened eyes as they watched my mocking face.

I released her then, and she sprang from me, to turn with a face blazing with shame. She strove for words, and when they did come it was in a bewildered cry of reproach.

"Why did you do that? Why?"

I looked at her full of a strange elation, yet in some degree ashamed.

"When we meet again, Désirée, I will tell you, and will seek your pardon."

She dashed indignant tears from her eyes.

"I hope I shall never see you again. I hope I shall forget that I ever saw you."

She turned and fled, and though I arose fairly early next morning, it was to find that she and her mistress had gone. The Countess had left a formal message, thanking me for my escort, and saying there was no further need for it, as a matter had arisen which demanded her immediate return home. I was not much surprised at this, though I had not expected they would have taken their departure so early.

AT this I made quick progress to Paris, and arrived at Court without further adventure. I had the honour to be immediately received by the King, and alone in his Cabinet. He glanced through the despatch I delivered to him, and adding some notes, handed them to an officer he summoned. Then his Majesty graciously expressed a desire to hear a full account of my journey, and I related the perils which had beset me—all excepting that arising from my meeting with Désirée, though I mentioned how I had given the Countess the escort she had demanded.

"A modest account of a very excellent performance," graciously remarked his Majesty. "But I asked you for the full story, M. de Beaujolais, and you have omitted the incident connected with that very charming waiting-maid of Madame du Bartas."

To say I was utterly confounded is no more than the truth, and the King laughed aloud at my evident confusion.

"Sire, how is it possible that you can know—?"

"Kings should have eyes everywhere, M. de Beaujolais, and if I have any lack it is well supplied by your master the Cardinal-Duke. But how did you contrive to cheat the fair siren into believing her wiles had succeeded? That, to my mind, is the most surprising of your escapes."

"It was simple enough, your Majesty. A false despatch had been prepared, and sealed with the seal of his Eminence. It was that which I carried in the lining of my cloak."

"Entrebient!" laughed the King. "And did you pretend not to miss the packet from the lining?"

"It was easy to do that, Sire. She had replaced it with another."

"Ma foi! A pretty pair you two would make. But did you know the maid was other than she appeared to be?"

"I suspected, sire. Indeed it crossed my mind, and I am more sure of it now, that she and I had met before, though I cannot remember where."

"No wonder, for the circumstances of your former meeting must have been very different."

"Perhaps your Majesty can tell me who she is?" I asked eagerly.

"No; you must find that out for yourself; but I can tell you that she is the heiress of a rich and noble house. And now, M. de Beaujolais, of my own pleasure, as well as by the request of the Cardinal-Duke, who seems to take a fatherly interest in you, I give you the privilege of naming your own reward for your service."

"I am deeply grateful, sire; but the knowledge that what I have done meets with your Majesty's approval, is in itself a sufficient reward."

"It seems that the Cardinal's service is a good school for courtiers, as well as for brave men," said the King with a smile. "Have you any knowledge of the contents of the despatch you carried?"

"None whatever, sire."

"It contains proof, and a list of names, relating to a plot for the downfall of your master, and for a curtailment of my own powers. I have now issued instructions for the arrest of the conspirators. There—"

The Hen, One Minister's First Aid

WHEN the records of the Connecticut Home Egg-Laying Contest were tabulated recently in an effort to determine what poultryman of the State had been most successful in getting hens to lay eggs during 1920, lo, a preacher's name led all the rest.

Eight white Wyandotte pullets belonging to Rev. Marshall Dawson of Storrs laid an average of 220.4 eggs from November, 1919, to November, 1920. That was 11.9 eggs a hen more than the next highest flock of the 153 that finished the contest. It was very near to the highest averages made in the various international contests instituted to establish world records.

However, it was not for fame but for money that Mr. Dawson embarked in the poultry business, and it wasn't money for the sake of money, but for the sake of proving that a rural minister can fight out his economic problems right in the rural community and, winning, can hold his head high and walk steadfast in his faith. Mr. Dawson never preaches from the text that says something to the effect that "the meek shall inherit the earth." Too many rural pastors interpret that phrase literally. It doesn't mean what so many of us think it means.

"One cannot live," says Mr. Dawson, "in the consciousness of failure without deteriorating."

HE DRAWS a lesson from his poultry flock:

"In the fall I select the very best and most enterprising cockerels of the flock, those I should like to use as breeders, and put them together for their 'try-outs'. The weakest are defeated and they cannot get away from that knowledge. The defeated cockerel breaks down with surprising rapidity. A fine cockerel, weighing nearly eight pounds at the age of six months, may weigh not more than five or six pounds a month later. If we may say it, not irreverently, 'he has lost his soul.' He skulks in the dark corners and takes his food furtively. When he gets the axe, cutting off his head is an act of charity."

"Now the trouble with the rural ministry is that it has lost enterprise and flavor through defeat. Instead of facing toward the world as conquerors for Christ, great numbers are living apologies for their existence. Sunday after Sunday they face awful defeat in the form of empty pews; and month after month they face awful defeat in the form of empty pocketbooks."

That is the philosophy that induced Rev. Marshall Dawson to turn from the Yale School of Religion to a rural pastorate when he might have taken an easier path by way of a city church. He took up the study of poultry because he wanted to prove that the rural minister could obtain economic independence, and in doing so strengthen himself in the esteem of his congregation—esteem that a material world bestows upon the successful.

Mr. Dawson believes that bees, pigs, potatoes, sheep, small fruits, or any other agricultural "side-line" can be followed with success by the rural minister. He selected poultry chiefly because so many amateurs have failed with poultry. He wanted to prove that close study, hard work and faith will win through.

At present, Mr. Dawson feels that his experiment is not completed. He wants one more year to test out his theories. He would have preferred to have delayed publicity on what he is doing, but the "story" of a preacher who beats the State in making hens lay eggs when eggs are worth around $1 a dozen, was too good for the newspapers to overlook.

THIS year Mr. Dawson expects to clear from $1,000 to $1,500 from his flock. He thinks this much is needed to eke out the pastor's salary to a point where he and his family will be free from the soul-trying economies that only the minister with a small congregation can know. He hasn't quite reached that point, but the past few months his net profits from the flock have been $90 a month or more. His total flock now numbers 138 birds, of which the eight entered in the contest were the best of his foundation stock. Next year he hopes to have 200 pullets, all white Wyandottes and all bred and selected on the basis of his belief in the principles of heredity and individuality.

Mr. Dawson regrets that he never went to an agricultural college. He thinks this should be a part of the training of the rural ministry. To offset this handicap he has taken as much time as they could grant of the specialists in poultry husbandry at the Connecticut Agricultural College, which is but a mile from his small ranch. He has studied bulletins, books and farm papers. More especially, he has studied the hen.

He believes firmly in "hen psychology." Laying hens, he says, must be kept interested. They respond to clean litter, ventilated houses, balanced rations, fresh water, shade and every attention to their physical wants. During the winter artificial lights are turned on at 5 a.m. but are not used in the evening. The hen can work so hard and no harder and if advanced too rapidly may go into moult at a time when she should be laying at her best.

So far, Mr. Dawson's theories seem to be working out. He is very close to his goal of at least $100 a month in egg profits and he has gained standing in the community. Mr. Dawson's congregation is made up of college professors and their families and of small farmers and their families. Neither the professors nor the farmers are notoriously wealthy and the poultry income is needed in the Dawson home. Both the professors and the farmers are proud of the preacher who beat the State with a flock of hens. There seems, too, to be a new "pep" to the sermons—at least the college students think so. Mr. Dawson's theories may not work on other ministers and other rural communities, but they have worked on Dawson and they have worked on Storrs.

"First in World Service"

SHALL this nation go, as some short-sighted advisers would have it go, along "the line of least resistance;" or, as we believe the spirit of our people sincerely desires, shall it rather prepare to render real world service, by accepting those responsibilities which we are called to assume in fulfilling our mission as a leader in the great movement for world peace?

This is the one overshadowing problem of our time—and it is one that can not be evaded. Upon our interpretation of it and the courage with which we grasp it, not only our own future but in greater measure that of the whole world depends.

It is a time for plain speaking and clear thinking—a time when small policies are out of place and broad-mindedness should have the right of way. And it is fortunate that able leaders are not lacking. Such men as Presidents Lowell of Harvard and Hibben of Princeton, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, of New York, and a good-sized group of others, in recent addresses have sounded the call. They have given to the slogan of "America First," the larger and nobler meaning, namely that our mission is to be "First in World Service."

That the troubles of Europe do not concern Europe alone but ourselves as well, becomes more evident as the months bring new developments. While the whole world waits hoping that we mean to give practical form to our plans for international arms reduction, it comes to light that Danzig is selling arms to Mexico and that American manufacturers are secretly shipping quick-firers to Ireland. While we go on wrangling over domestic affairs, shaving and paring our taxes and tariffs, the far greater task of bringing peace to the world to accomplish which we entered the war, still lies unfinished. Nations are left to drift and the uncertainty of America's course has already helped to produce a group of new wars, which might have been avoided had we assumed the post to which we were entitled and which the nations would have been prompt to recognize and respect.

There are calls for the United States to aid in mediating in international disputes where peace or war hangs by a thread and there are also calls for American judges in a World Court representing thirty-nine nations, to assist by their counsel in settling differences which at any time may assume international importance. These people want the great western Republic and none else to be the peace-bringer. They have confidence in our sense of international justice, they believe us to be unbiased and they feel that they can trust us fully. In all of these lands, America is the world's hope. Dare we assume the responsibility of refusing to act as peacemakers?

All the talk of becoming involved in Europe's entanglements is now seen to have been the flamboyant oratory of political partisans. There never has been a time when we could not avoid, honorably and effectively, any such danger if it ever really existed.

Is it not our duty as a civilized nation to help save the world from itself? And how can this be done, if we continue to stand aloof in pharisaical attitude until the great opportunity for service is past forever?

Smoke Houses

ALARGE-SIZED complaint comes from many sources in prohibition towns where the saloon has been outlawed for many years, asking what can be done to correct the evils of what are known as "smoke houses."

These places have sprung up all over the Middle West, and in the state of Kansas, for example, where prohibition has been accepted as the law for over forty years, they are, or seem to be in one sense, an attempt to substitute something for the saloon, as a gathering-place for boys and young men where pool tables and billiards and general loafing of the "gang" are features.

Fathers and mothers of boys of high school age complain bitterly in many cases of these "smoke houses" and in several instances have gone to the owners of these places of amusement and asked the proprietors to refuse to allow the boys entrance for the purpose of spending money and time in them. But it is the avowed purpose, of course, of such resorts to make all the money they can from their patrons, and it is not surprising that the owners refuse to yield to the request of the parents to keep their boys out.

It may be said that the parents should have enough authority over their young folks to keep them at home at night, or become good chums with them so that they will not want to go away. But as a matter of fact, there are thousands of parents who either do not have any influence over their own children, or are afraid to thwart them in their search for amusement. And the "smoke houses" have taken thousands of these boys and are getting out of them a vast amount of money, and what is more vital, consuming precious time, and putting the lads into vulgar and harmful company.

As one indignant father recently said, commenting on this particular form of amusement in a small town out West: "I went in one night to observe, and I was appalled at the vulgarity of the talk that went around among these boys and young men, who ought to have been either at home or in some good place of instruction or amusement. The most serious thing about it all, to my mind, as the evening went on, up to midnight, was the awful waste of time and money on the part of these young lives in a place that had nothing to offer except a game of pool, often played with secret understanding that amounted to betting on the results, and in an atmosphere that reeked with profanity, vile stories and sordid comments on the young women who walked past windows, from behind which boys and men sat and leered at life, sodden in vulgarity and lost to all the finer decencies."

This is a pretty strong indictment of an institution that exists in hundreds of towns out of which the saloon has gone. And it is not surprising that many parents look upon the "smoke house" in the town as almost as bad in its influence as the saloon used to be.

Has the church in the saloonless town nothing to offer the boys and young men that is a better substitute than the smoke house? So far, in a good many such towns, the smoke house is beating the church, the home and the school.

A Gigantic Libation

TO SPILL into the Atlantic $50,000,000 worth of liquor, seized by the dry authorities and the New York police in recent raids, is announced as a spectacular feature of the vigorous prohibition campaign, to be expected at an early date.

How the ancients, who were given to pouring out libations to their heathen gods, would turn in their graves if they could hear of such a spectacle! The wets will no doubt shudder at the very thought of the waste of so much liquor; but the sacrifice will have the moral value at least of averting drunkenness, crime and demoralization and of upholding the majesty of the law.

The plan as announced is to tow the stuff down in garbage boats from New York to Sandy Hook, where it will be dumped overboard. It will do no harm to the ocean, although bathers and passing vessels may possibly get a whiff of the biggest cocktail ever known on this planet as the stuff goes down. Nobody will be the worse off for the sacrifice and many will be the gainers. Doubtless the "movies" will improve, the opportunity to set forth the new lesson in temperance warfare to good advantage, as showing the wets overwhelmed by wetness immeasurable.

New Views on Christian Unity

THERE are evidences that Christian Unity, although perhaps less widely discussed than during the active period of the great war, is by no means a forgotten problem. Some of the ablest minds in denominational leadership are giving it mature consideration. Bishop McDowell, in a recent article, held that lack of a clear understanding on the subject is the principal obstacle to progress. Now Prof. W. A. Brown of Union Theological Seminary, New York, comes to the front to enlighten the average man with a timely and helpful contribution in the June issue of the Constructive Quarterly. He begins by pointing out that Christian Unity may mean different things to different people. He tells of a recent gathering of ecclesiastics who, though familiar with the question in its different aspects, were yet so dissimilar with respect to the end sought, that they found it difficult if not impossible to reach any basis of agreement. With right good-will, therefore, the Professor has taken up the task of making things clear, both to the pulpit and the pew.

At the outset, he draws the distinction between church union and Christian Unity. The first he explains is external, the second spiritual. "Christians possess Unity in the measure that they are one with Christ in spirit, and as such are members of His invisible Church—the company of all the regenerate, who share His divine and redeeming life. Union, on the other hand is a matter of external organization. It concerns churches rather than the individuals who compose them."

To most people this would seem to be a distinction sufficiently comprehensive and easily understood; but we are next reminded by the Professor that a still closer analysis is necessary. Christian Unity is "a matter of the inner spiritual life" . . . "Co-operation is a matter of the will" . . . "Church Union is a matter of official relationships." . . . "It may or may not involve uniformity, depending upon the degree to which this is carried. As a matter of fact, few proposals for union do advocate uniformity. They recognize that the union to be sought must make room for variety, and are prepared to take over in greater or less degree the machinery, as well as the ideals and convictions, of the uniting bodies."

Now, the Church Unity proposition, as far as our observation goes, has not necessarily involved organic unity, but simply spiritual unity and whole-hearted co-operation in the largest sense. Advocates of Christian Unity, it is true, would welcome closer organic relations in those large denominations which at the present time are divided into different groups. But even that is a matter for the future, and may safely be left to the development of the spirit of Unity. Every Christian entertains the hope that the time will come when the reunion of Christendom will be realized in the coming together in closer, harmonious spiritual and administrative relations, of all the various bodies that now compose the Church of Christ; but it is not a matter to be forced through the agencies available at the present time. When the reunion does come, it will be the work of the Holy Spirit moving upon the churches.

One point which Professor Brown emphasizes should not be overlooked. Speaking of organic union he says: "It is such a complete surrender and absorption of the existing denominational bodies in their own church which is contemplated by many High Churchmen of every denomination. When they speak of organic union, they mean the inclusion of all persons who desire to be recognized as Christians in a single authoritative Church. It is fear of such absorption and surrender which explains the strong opposition of powerful groups of Christians to organic union in any form." This is a dream hardly to be realized in an age the spirit of which calls for the utmost freedom in religion and its forms of expression. But even conceding that a serious obstacle in the way of Christian Unity is that many fear lest its coming would affect the corporate and official church organizations now existing, the fear is groundless. There is not and never has been any proposition which would involve the effacement of a single denomination. When they come together, they will do so spontaneously and the movement will be irresistible. Just what is to be gained, after all, by projecting so large a field of discussion on the screen will be difficult for many to understand. What a multitude of earnest souls in all the churches have been hoping and praying for; what the great spiritual leaders both here and abroad, are working for diligently, is the movement for Christian Unity in the form of closer relationships, the merging of great spiritual interests and Gospel enterprises, and the fullest co-operation.

Christian Unity, in the true sense of the term, does not mean one great dominating Church, which has the right to dictate to the Christian world. The Unity which is the hope of the Church and toward which all earnest Christians are striving, is that spiritual unity for which Jesus prayed: "That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou has sent me." This type of Unity of the hearts, souls and consciences of men would bring the Church in all its branches closely together in all that related to the advancement of the Kingdom, no matter under what names or leaderships they might be arranged.

Saved Tens of Thousands

REV. Z. CHARLES BEALS, treasurer of the Christian Herald famine relief committee in China says in a letter just received in the office:

"Rev. G. Harding writes me: 'Praise God for the Christian Herald gift. We did need it so for our starving Christians here. What a glorious thing to have such a fund at such a time as this.' Others have written saying: 'If this Christian Herald money had not been sent out tens of thousands of men, women and children would have perished. Funds from other sources came later. How these gifts have saved the situation! Praise the Lord!'"

Christian Endeavor on the Side

"MABEL, get some weeds! They'll start the fire grand!"
 "Weeds? What's weeds?"
 "Oh, you know! Leaves!"

The heights above Clove Lake, Staten Island, were dotted with groups of fresh-air seekers upon as balmy a Saturday afternoon as New York City had known for a while. The speakers were Brooklyn Intermediates; the occasion a Brooklyn Intermediate Christian Endeavor Union picnic. Although the corporate limits of New York City include seven hundred and fifty honest-to-goodness farms by actual statistics, yet of the city's millions there are the innumerable ones to whom all foliage and growing things are strange and lovely luxuries.

The Brooklyn City Union ranks as the first of the Christian Endeavor organizations to go into Fresh-Air work. The story is related of a general secretary of the United Society who entered a hotel in a convention city to engage accommodations for delegates. The manager seemed puzzled at the name "Christian Endeavor"; then brightened:

"Oh! That's the organization of young people in the church where they stand up in meeting and cling to chairs and try to read a clipping or—or something—isn't it?"

Twenty-nine years ago such a conception of Christian Endeavor may have lingered in the mind of the average layman. Today the spread of the movement, its world work, is familiar to the general membership of the church, but many Christians fail utterly to realize the various channels into which the young people have spread their activities. Christian Endeavor as an institution in the church has won its spurs. But Christian Endeavor on the side—?

Fresh-Air work is the most generally established of the side activities. In the year of the second great New York Convention it is a pretty self-contained union that does not have some particular pet work which it sustains entirely through its own effort, and few things are as popular as the summer relief for the kiddies of the slums.

Brooklyn has maintained its camp for years. So that the union might own and manage property, it has been incorporated under the laws of the state. Its camp at Huntington, Long Island, comprises several acres of choice ground, mostly wooded. Every year more than two thousand children of the poorer sections are given vacations. More than five thousand dollars annually are contributed to the work.

Philadelphia has a well established Fresh-Air camp at Green Lane. Here more than a thousand youngsters are each given a two-weeks' vacation. Newark, through the Essex County organization of New Jersey, maintains a camp, "New Fernwood," at Roseland, N. J., Hudson County, embracing Jersey City, maintains a camp. Even the Staten Island Union, an organization of less than twenty-five societies, has contributed five hundred dollars to Fresh-Air work for the year 1921.

THE Pennsylvania State Union has given prominence to an unusual sort of Christian Endeavor activity, the floating work in Philadelphia Harbor. This contact with the sailors upon the ships has been so successful that the business men's organizations among the Philadelphia shipping interests have given official recognition to the Endeavorers. In the years of the work no ship and no dock has been barred to the groups of young people. The exhibit of the floating work at the New York Convention has been financed entirely by Philadelphia shippers.

Perhaps the principal feature of the floating work is the sailor's comfort kit given free of charge to the men each Christmas. Each bag is made of durable material, ten by thirteen inches

Some Unusual Channels Into Which the Great Work Has Spread

By MARC EDMUND JONES

(Executive Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Convention Committee)

Christian Endeavor within prison walls, the Society at the Reformatory, Frankfort, Ky., gathered around the C. E. flower-bed square when flat. In each is placed a Testament or Bible, a pin-cushion filled, a book of needles, two spools of thread, a small bag of buttons, a pair of scissors, a bottle of vaseline, a roll of rags for bandages, and a personal letter. At Christmas in 1920 exactly 1240 of these kits were given away in the course of personal visits to the ships.

Part of the starboard watch and the Wilmington, S. C., Floating C. E. Society after a service aboard a warship Floating work, of course, is not confined to Philadelphia. The Floating Society of Wilmington, N. C., has been one of the most active in this country. Chicago has performed a splendid service. Floating work is particularly a feature of Christian Endeavor in Great Britain. In ten years the British Endeavorers have distributed at Christmas more than one million individual comfort kits.

A husky lot this—an army Christian Endeavor Society at Camp Travis, Texas

The appeal of the floating work is the appeal of men shut away from home influence and the softening surroundings of a home life for the principal part of their working time. To Christian Endeavor the "shut-in" has been a subject of particular interest always. And so there has grown the work in institutions, of which the hospital work in particular should be mentioned.

THE New York City unions have taken an enthusiastic interest in hospital work. On one special Sunday virtually every hospital of any prominence in Manhattan was Island covered by the West Side District, a local union of some twenty societies. The Staten Island Union has a regular schedule throughout the year for prison visitation.

Of the work among "shut-ins" the prison work deserves high rank. This first was started in the reformatory at Frankfort, Kentucky, by Commissioner Frederick A. Wallis, now chairman of the New York 1921 convention committee. At the present time, the society in the institution has about 1700 members. Governor McCreery said upon one occasion:

"Christian Endeavor is worth more to the State of Kentucky in its work for men and women behind prison bars than all other religious agencies in Kentucky combined."

Recently at a Kentucky State Convention, two of the convention sessions were held behind the prison bars. "Dan" Poling gives testimony to the fact that he has never failed to gain a riotous demonstration of approval from his audience whenever he makes his favorite statement: "There are more Christian Endeavorers behind prison bars today than at any period since the foundation of the movement."

Similar in some degree to the prison work is the Americanization program of Christian Endeavor. The City Union of Lorain, Ohio, for more than ten years has conducted classes in English among the foreigners. The text book has been the Gospel of John, serving to tie religious to secular instruction.

THE service of Christian Endeavor to good citizenship in general has been marked by a number of striking individual achievements. The Atlantic City Convention in 1911 gave the county the prophetic phrase "A Saloonless Nation by 1920." The Chicago Union conceived and carried through to successful conclusion a campaign to give the letter-carriers a rest day of one out of every seven, a service which resulted in formal testimony from the letter-carriers' organization, together with a substantial money contribution to the union for its regular work.

Among the odd civic services of Christian Endeavor unions was the action of the Cleveland organization in agreeing to ice during each summer any number of drinking fountains which the city might be willing to install; a contract faithfully executed by the young people.

In the recent war Christian Endeavor did not fail to meet the challenge. More than 200,000 Endeavorers served in the Allied Armies, but more than that, the unions through the country hurried to render service as individual organizations, and the record is a fine one and a clean one.

Army Christian Endeavor did not start with the war, however, nor has it ended with the close of hostilities. The high achievements during the dark years of the recent conflict include the action of the Oregon and Washington organizations, which furnished all the huts for the Y. M. C. A. workers in camps in those states. The Christian Endeavorers of the Island of Jamaica took over the basement of a ruined chateau in Belgium and held services every morning just before

Two Steps Toward Lighter Tax Burdens

TWO important steps have been taken by the administration which are designed to lighten the burden on the more or less impatient taxpayer. The first is a constructive reform for which public spirited men have been laboring for several years and which was made possible during the last session of Congress by the passage of the National Budget bill. Under the provisions of the bill, which provides for the appointment under the President of a Director of the Budget, General Charles G. Dawes as director has assumed the unenviable task of removing several thousand employees from the Federal payroll, consolidating bureaus and department divisions, eliminating overlapping services and otherwise outlining a program putting the Government on a real business basis.

General Dawes's first act was to announce that he will call for a group of able business men not heretofore associated with governmental affairs and draft them for the budget bureau until the opening of the next regular Congress in December. He plans to turn them loose in the department headquarters with instructions to recommend department reorganizations on the most efficient possible business lines. An appreciation on the part of these men of the financial crisis that confronts the Government is depended on to ensure their response to the call on the "dollar a year" basis made so familiar during the war. No estimate has been made with accuracy of the money to be saved by a proper co-ordination of Government branches but the sum is expected to reach the tens of millions.

The second step in the effort to reduce the general economic load takes the form of a bill introduced in the Senate and House at the request of President Harding giving authority to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon to arrange for the refunding of loans made to allied governments during the war, as well as other foreign obligations growing out of the war and post-war period. This action was taken after a survey of the situation abroad convinced the treasury officials that payment of principal or interest by the foreign governments would be almost impossible for the present. Tables accompanying a report by Mr. Mellon to the President show that debts of foreign governments to the United States now aggregate $10,141,267,585. Of this amount, $9,435,225,329 represents advances made under the Liberty Bond acts and the remainder grants of surplus war materials, and supplies from the United States Grain Corporation and the American Relief Administration.

The question of arriving at a settlement of the problem growing out of our foreign loans has been a particularly serious one for the treasury officials since the end of the war. No interest has been paid on the loans, against which there has been regular disbursement of interest to the American people in whose hands are the bonds out of which these loans were made.

It apparently is Mr. Mellon's proposal, after conferences with large numbers of bankers, to arrange with our foreign debtors to take up their notes with bonds which shall be turned over to the United States and marketed here, these bonds being so devised that they will care not only for the principal of the debt and the current interest, but for interest past due in some instances as much as three and a half years. Such an arrangement would enable the government to either retire a certain proportion of Liberty Bonds or eliminate a good part of an interest charge aggregating about $400,000,000 annually.

Hearings have been opened on the bill suggested by the President and there is every probability that it will be passed. Virtually the only argument advanced against it is on the ground that it confers too much authority on the Secretary of the Treasury.

amount of the beverage a physician can prescribe. The result of the Palmer decision has been preparation by large brewing interests to open their plants and run full steam to supply the anticipated demand. The Willis-Campbell bill would allow one pint for one patient every ten days. As to the new Volstead bill, it has run on rocks rolled in its path by chemical and industrial interests who say not enough consideration has been given to their raw alcohol requirements.

The Question of Beer

SENATOR WILLIS of Ohio and Representative S Campbell of Kansas, both strong advocates of Prohibition, have undertaken to bring about a settlement in Congress of the fight over beer for medicinal purposes. They have introduced in their respective houses a bill which in effect is a segregation from the supplemental Volstead enforcement bill of provision preventing physicians from prescribing beer for their patients. An effort is being made to obtain action on the bills before the new rules of the Internal Revenue Bureau regarding medical uses for beer become operative. Under these rules, based on a decision by ex-Attorney General Palmer, no limit is placed on the Thus it will be seen that the Foreign Secretary and Mr. Lansing are pretty much in accord as to the proceedings of the Paris conference.

The attack on the League came as a great surprise to the English public. On the subject of mandates Lord Curzon said he expected the League Council to defer discussion of mandates in deference to the wishes of the United States and that in taking this action the Council would find Britain in entire agreement with it.

Agree on Naval Bill

THE House and Senate conferees, after considerable discussion during which the House group once declined to continue the meetings, have come to an agreement on the naval appropriations bill. The conference report fixes $417,000,000 as a total. The original Senate bill carried $496,000,000 and the House bill $398,000,000. The new measure retains the Borah proposal for initiating disarmament through a meeting of Great Britain, Japan and the United States at the invitation of President Harding. The bill makes provision for a personnel of 106,000 men as compared with 120,000 provided for by the Senate and 100,000 by the House.

In this connection it may be noted that the preponderant strength of the navy, by orders just issued by the Secretary of the Navy, will be transferred from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The new Pacific fleet will be approximately 25 per cent. stronger in tonnage and gun power than the fleet based in the Atlantic.

Open Fight on Bonus Bill

SENATOR BORAH has opened a fight in the Senate on the soldier bonus bill on the ground that it will add a burden of from $1,500,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 to the taxpayers of the country. Sentiment on the bill seems to be pretty well divided regardless of political lines. It is being attacked largely on the ground that it is

Living for Eternity

A Sermon by REV. D. J. BURRELL, D.D.*

TEXT—John 14: 4. "We know not whither thou goest."

THE other day one of our distinguished men, anticipating death under the scalpel, wrote a farewell note to his friends, in which he said, "I don't know where I am going, but I am going to find out."

Is that the best that can be said? Let us see.

Can it be proven that there is anything beyond the border line? Certainly not, if by "proof" is meant mathematical demonstration. No spiritual problem can be solved that way. One might as well insist on seeing with his ears or hearing with his eyes as to expect to verify any spiritual fact by the evidence of the physical senses; for "spiritual things are spiritually discerned." The man who refuses to exercise faith—the sixth sense, with which he has been divinely equipped for this very purpose, and by which he is distinguished from all the lower orders of life—is self-doomed to perpetual ignorance with respect to every thing that lies beyond the horizon of his finger-tips.

But why should we insist on such a demonstration of immortality. It is enough to say "I am." This throws the burden of proof on the other man; since the presumption is always in favor of the status quo. I am; therefore I shall continue to be; unless it can be shown that something will occur to make an end of me. So far as anybody knows or can know, death is simply a moving out and moving on. To say that because I must presently vacate this tabernacle of flesh I shall no longer exist is as transparently illogical as it would be to infer from the sign "To Let" on an empty house that the former tenants had lapsed into nothingness.

If our interest in the problem of immortality has its roots in anything deeper than mere curiosity we would do well to inquire within. Let us ask ourselves, "If I die, shall I live again?" and note the immediate and indignant response, "I shall live and not die!" (Job 14: 4 cf. PSALM 118: 17.)

AND after that it would be well to listen to the consensus of all ages and generations of the children of men. Why did the Greeks place an obolus on the tongues of their beloved dead? To pay their ferriage over the Styx into a future life. Why did the Romans write Emigravit on their tombstones? Because they thought of death as a mere moving on. Why did the Egyptians mummy their dead? Because they believed in a future reunion of body and soul. Why do the American Indians bury with their chieftain his favorite horse and his bow and arrows? Because they think he will need them in the happy hunting grounds further on. Why is a Zulu in mid-Africa afraid of the crooked stick which he worships as a fetish in the midst of his kraal? Because he believes the spirits of the dead have taken possession of it. Where in all the world or along the centuries will you find a nation without a belief in immortality? Nowhere.

Is it likely that the God who guides the homing swallows through the trackless skies would have abandoned the whole human race to a delusive dream? Not even the infidel Ingersoll was prepared to go so far. Here is what he said at his brother's grave: "Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word; but in the night of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing."

BUT if immortality is a fact, how does it happen that the word "immortality" does not occur in the Bible from Genesis to Malachi? For the best of reasons, to-wit, because immortality is the postulate on which the inspired Book rests and without which it would be as meaningless as so much empty air. As well ask why the word "people" is not to be found in our City Directory; the fact being that the Directory is all people and without people there would be no Directory. The Bible is intended for men and women who feel the need of direction as to a future life. If any one is persuaded that he is no better than a sheep and is content to live and die accordingly, he will find nothing to attract him in these Oracles of God.

But after all, the question is really not "Does death end all?" but, assuming that we are to live forever, what shall we do about it? In other words, What is the working value of a belief in immortality?

To begin with, it furnishes a satisfactory explanation of Life:

It is a matter of supreme importance that we should know what life is: otherwise we are no better than shipwrecked mariners on a rotten raft, drifting, without a compass, on an unknown and uncharted sea.

It is a line beginning at the cradle and ending at the grave? Is it an O. Henry story running through three-score and ten pages to a Finis? Then our proper place is with the Epicureans who said, "Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die." The Great White Way for us!

Or is it the Preface of a serial that is to be "continued in our next" forever? If so, let us live so.

It makes a vast difference to me whether I am meditating a week-end in Atlantic City or a journey around the world. In the one case a hand-bag will answer my purpose; but the other requires an elaborate course of preparation, in which prudence will probably suggest a life-insurance policy and certainly a letter of credit. The next thing in order is to lay the foundation; and "other foundation can no man lay than Christ Jesus." He being the Rock of Ages. Then comes the Superstructure; which is nothing less or more than the imitation of Christ. So emerges our life work: "More like Jesus would I be."

BUT Character-building is not all. If it were, life would be a very selfish thing. We are called to Usefulness.

entitled to a place among those "ministering spirits" who perpetually "do serve Him." The loneliest man over yonder will be the man who, when he was down here, learned how to make money, how to enjoy himself, how to win the favor of his fellows, how to do everything but serve the Lord. O poor millionaire; fit for nothing but to be a novice among the expert workmen of God!

If, therefore, it is true that we live forever, let us be living that way. I do not like "the pale realms of shade," nor do I care to think of lying down to "pleasant dreams." Oh, no! Rather to an instant awakening, to a glorious surprise, to a revelation of things that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have ever entered into the heart of man!

The life that we are now living is the bud of eternity. A foolish husbandman is he who plucks the blossoms of his fruit-trees for a nosegay; but not more foolish than the sybarite who uses up his precious hours and moments for a fleeting joy or passing gain. He who lives truly for the day, lives for eternity, by fertilizing the roots of his orchard and spraying the stirring promise of its boughs that the ingathering may not fail him.

An old preacher named Marshall, who lived three hundred years ago, left among his papers this quaint parable: "A certain man, being come to market with a considerable sum of money about him, whilst walking in the throng and considering with himself how he should invest to the best advantage, some sly fellow cut his purse or at unawares dove into his pocket; and there was an end of all his marketing. So it is with those who, whilst they are in the midst of secular employments and, as it were, crowded in the throng of worldly contrivances—how to secure such a ship, advantage or trade (things in themselves with necessary cautions not unlawful)—in steps death, cuts the thread of their life, spoils all their trade and lays their glory in the dust."

WHEREFORE, make haste, O man, to live. The flight of a projectile is determined by the direction of a gun at the moment of its discharge. What we are doing today is what we are likely to be doing forever. What we need is the far-away look—the look of a man who takes immortality into the reckoning. To line up with Christ here and now in the service of God and our fellowmen is the best preparation for usefulness in the interminable aeons of the life further on.

And what of death? Death is the gateway of the beyond. Mors janua vitae! O brightest angel of all who through the shining seats of heaven, roll back the gates! We have climbed the stairway of the years with weary feet and, fearing, have malignèd thee as "the King of Terrors." Count it not against us; but smiling at our fears, roll back the gates! Too long have we played at living, even when we thought of doing our best. The lights are shining yonder within the gates, and hands—familiar hands—are beckoning —and songs come floating this way. O benignant angel of the apocalypse, roll back the gates and bid us enter into life!

The Summer at Northfield

THE 1921 program of the Northfield Conferences and Summer Schools, founded by D. L. Moody, at East Northfield, Mass., is of unusual interest to Christian workers all over the country. From July 5 to 11, the Interdenominational Women's Home Mission Summer School is in session, with the general theme of its meetings "Facing Our Unfinished Task in America." It will be followed by the Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies, lasting until July 19, at which a careful study will be made of the serious conditions of social unrest throughout the world. Next will come the eighteenth annual session of the Summer School of Religious Education, July 21-28, with a strong faculty under the leadership of Dr. Norman E. Richardson, of the Department of Religious Education of Northwestern University. The Mount Hermon School commencement will be on July 26, and July 30 to August 1 will be devoted to the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the institution. The thirty-ninth annual session of the General Conference of Christian Workers, July 30 to August 14, will lay special stress upon the problems confronting the ministry, not only in the large centers but also in the rural districts, and several notable speakers already have promised to attend. The Massachusetts Christian Endeavor Institute will meet at Northfield, August 15-21.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Praise God from whom all Blessings Flow," or "Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—God's Goodness and Mercy. Psalm 145; Verses 10 to 21.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 490, first column.)

Sermon—"LIVING FOR ETERNITY"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Beulah Land," or "Whosoever Will."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

May we part after this service, gracious and tender-hearted God and Father, with the assurance that Thou art mightier than all the forces of the world, stronger than all evil, wiser than all mankind, more merciful than the best of human parents, and filled with Thy peace make us strong to meet all our tasks this coming week. In Jesus' Name we ask it. AMEN.

I am sorry for a man who, nowadays, can pursue the comfortable tenor of his way without hearing the bitter cry of those who perish of cold and hunger. A few weeks ago several millions in China were in danger of starving before the rice harvest came in. Who were they? Hath not a coolie "hands, organs, dimensions, affections, passions? Is he not fed with the same food and hurt with the same weapons" as other men?

But have you heard the deeper cry of the imperishable souls of those millions for the Bread of which if a man eat he shall never hunger and never die? To answer that pleading voice and those beckoning hands a small army of consecrated men and women have set forth with the Gospel of grace. What have you to say to that? Are you calling "Come back! Charity begins at home"? Then God pity you for a mannikin. If Augustine had not gone to Britain as the pursuivant of Foreign Missions you would still be out with a club after provender and a wife, as your ancestors were. Who are we to call "Come back" when the Lord says "Go"? But if death ends all for a coolie or for any other man, then Missions at home or abroad are simply a fool's errand, and Christ was a mere dreamer of dreams.

ON THE other hand, if the Captain of our Salvation was right, then our business is marked out for us. We are sent not as dying men on a forlorn hope, but as living men to the rescue of men who live forever. And if we fail we shall fall short of a title clear to the full possibilities of eternal life.

For what we call "life" is not really life, but only the vestibule of life further on. We are apprentices, learning how to do things for God, so that we may be

Sorrowful Yet Always Rejoicing

SUNDAY. I Peter 1:6. "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now ye have been put to grief." A present rejoicing set in the midst of an envying grief! A profound and refreshing satisfaction, even when the surface of the life is possessed by drought! I never expected to find a fountain in so unpromising a waste. "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice!"

Who ever expected to find a well in that Sahara? As I trod the hot burning sands of "reviling" and "persecuting" and false accusing, little did I anticipate encountering a fountain of spiritual delight. Let us once again contemplate the strange conjunction. "Woe unto thee, Bethsaida! Woe unto thee, Chorazin! Woe unto thee, Capernaum!" This on the one hand. And on the other hand, "A certain lawyer stood up, and tempted Him." And between the two, "Jesus rejoiced in the Spirit."

Again, I say, I am amazed at the setting. If life were a prolonged marriage-feast, one might anticipate hearing the happy bells at every corner of the way; but to hear the joyous peal in the hour of grievous midnight and eclipse arrests the heart in keen and strained surprise. "These things have I said unto you, that My joy may be in you." "My joy!" And yet Calvary loomed only a hand's-breadth off, just twenty-four hours away! I thought the joy bells might have been heard away back in Nazareth, in the beauty and serenity of a secluded village life, or on some quiet evening, with His friends on the Galilean lake; but I never anticipated hearing them at Calvary's base, in full view of shame and crucifixion.

"My joy!" "One of you shall betray Me." It is a marvelous conjunction, but one which is almost a commonplace in the Christian Scriptures. "They received the word in much affliction, with joy in the Holy Ghost." It is a mysterious, yet glorious wedlock. "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now . . . ye have been put to grief." What is the suggestion of this apparently forced and incongruous union? The suggestion is this, that the spiritual joy of the redeemed life is continuous, and is not conditioned by the changing moods of the transient day. Spiritual delights are not dried up when I pass into seasons of material drought.

When the shadows settle down upon my life, and my experiences darken into night, the night is not to be without its cheery and illuminating presence. The place of the midnight is to be as "the land of the midnight sun." There shall be light enough to enable me to read the promises, to see my way, and to perceive the gracious presence of my Lord. "He that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Therefore the shadow need not annihilate my joy. My temporary grief need not expunge my spiritual delights. The funeral knell of bereavement may be tolling in the outer rooms of the life, while in the most secret places may be heard the joy bells of trustful communion with God. "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now . . . ye have been put to grief." J. H. J.

The Surprising Love of God

MONDAY. I John 3:1. "What manner of love." A young man is sitting at table in his father's house. He is scarred with the marks of a misspent life; the wrinkles that never come off. What right has he there? He had been happy in his boyhood under the old roof-tree; but the wanderlust seized him. He said to his father, "Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me," and thereupon took his journey into a far country, where he wasted his substance in riotous living.

Then came the famine, the famine that inevitably comes in every wayward life; and he began to be in want. Out in the swine-field, friendless and famishing, he came to himself and said, "I will arise and go to to my father."

And his father received him. Behold what manner of love! His father saw him while he was yet a great way off and ran, and fell upon his neck and kissed him. So here he sits, the prodigal, clothed in the best robe and wearing the signet ring. What right has he here? That is the point. By all the standards of human judgment he should be reaping the harvest of his vices. But the father welcomed him with open arms. In this complete restoration of the prodigal, we have a wonderful exposition of the love of God.

The Test of True Discipleship

TUESDAY. Matt. 14:28. "Lord, bid me to come to Thee on the water." Peter walked safely on the waves while he looked unto Jesus, but when he gazed at the boisterous sea, he began to sink. "Come unto Me," and "Look unto Me" are the blessed words of Christ's invitation, but when our purpose is only self-gratification, for the display of our powers, or to satisfy unholy ambition, we sink and cry, "Lord, save or I perish!" Jesus had a high motive in walking on the waves—to save the disciples from shipwreck. Peter had no particular mission in mind and therefore failed.

At another time, Peter's curiosity led him to exclaim: "Lord, whither goest Thou?" but he did not wish to follow Jesus as much as he thought he did, for in the midst of danger and persecution, he denied Him thrice. But after Pentecost, he was a new Peter, following everywhere, even to the Cross, like unto his Lord.

When we are looking to perpetuate our own selfish desires, we sink into the depths of doubt. When the glory of Christ and the salvation of men is our aim, we walk safely everywhere as witnesses for Him. Willingness to go with Jesus into the garden, all the way to Calvary, down through the gates of death, is the test of true discipleship. Are we willing to be baptized with His baptism of suffering, or only to run well for a season of pleasure? E. W. C.

When Jesus Leads

WEDNESDAY. Mark 10:32. "They were on their way—and Jesus was going before them." On the way to Jerusalem, the Master was setting the pace and blazing the trail. The others were only followers, and we are informed that they had misgivings and fears as they watched their leader, striding on ahead. They were amazed and somehow they were frightened by the sight of Him, as with firm tread and resolute face He led them onward. They must quicken their steps; they dare not loiter, because He keeps right on! He seems strangely bent on getting there, and they wonder "why"? They begin to be afraid of this forward-looking Guide with the quick step. He has a goal in view—but is it safe to follow? What if He is leading them into trouble—can He be trusted to choose the pleasant road? Falteringly, fearfully, they trailed along behind the great Pathfinder and Pace-Maker.

Jesus is still leading troubled hearts onward. Still are His followers amazed and anxious as they fix their eyes upon His advancing figure. His course seems dangerous, and, according to this world's standards, unwise. He is not afraid of "Jerusalem"—but we are! We would prefer "climbing up some other way." The "straight and narrow" way looks unnecessarily difficult, and we follow very reluctantly and fall steadily to the rear. The distance between us and the Master is the measure of our distrust.

Alas! how many are afraid to follow Jesus at all? He is an undoubted radical; but they are naturally conservative! He is bent on finding His life by losing it; they timidly think that if they lose their lives, they would never find them again. "O ye of little faith, how long must I bear with you?" Where He leads, let us follow without fear—"Forward with Jesus."

W. L. G.

Learning of the Master

THURSDAY. Matt. 11:29. "Learn of me." Are we not to follow Christ's example as well as His precepts? Pictorial truth is the passion of the age, rather than abstract statement. Truth incarnated in persons is object-teaching of the most powerful kind. Like electricity, it is wireless, noiseless, unseen, everywhere present, the moral force of the soul. It is Peter's shadow healing the sick, unconscious power going out from a holy life. It is like little seeds scattered by the winds for an eternal harvest.

Moses and Stephen wist not that their faces shone, but the shining sermon of a look is preaching on forever. So the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ is illuminating the world. Let us look and learn of Him the secret of his shining.

The life of Christ is as precious as His Word; His purity is its power, His character its crown, His death its glory. Without these, His teachings would be as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

Should we not reflect the glory of God shining upon the winter of this world? Then we will live again after the stars fall, in the many minds that are made better by our presence through all the millenniums of eternity. E. W. C.

The Sure Anchorage

FRIDAY. Heb. 6:19. "Which hope we have, as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast." True hope is as the anchor of the soul, because it connects its possessor with an unseen world. When an anchor is cast overboard from a vessel, it drops out of sight, beneath the blue waves, which act as a kind of veil to hide it from view. The sailor does not see it, though he knows and feels that it is there. He perceives that his ship is anchored, though the secrets of the anchorage ground are concealed from his gaze.

Even so the apostle describes the Christian's hope, "as entered into that within the veil." Just as the veil of the temple concealed the "Holy of Holies," so there is a veil which hides from us the future; but the far-reaching hope of the believer passes beyond it, connects its possessor with the invisible world and seeks to appropriate the glory which is yet to be revealed.

Again, the anchor possesses enduring strength. When once the anchor is embedded in the ocean's bottom, with what a firm grasp does it hold fast the largest vessel! An emblem this, of the strength of true hope! It is both "sure and steadfast," for it rests not upon the broken promises of man, but the unchanging promises of God.

Other hopes may disappear and disappoint, but this anchor, never! It gives the soul absolute calmness and security amid the storms and stress of life. W. S. S.

The Great Commission

SATURDAY. Mark 16:15. "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." This is the Great Commission, the great command from the Captain of our faith, ranging in importance with the Ten Commandments of personal conduct and that other dictum called "the new commandment" that we love one another even as He loved us. Jesus was Himself the Divine missionary, and the Disciple band learned world-needs at His feet and went forth to missionize all humanity.

It is not possible to separate the missionary idea from the Christian idea. The missionary enterprise and the Christian life are synonymous. To separate the two is as impossible. They are the fruit from one tree, the flowers from the same seed, the growth from the same seed. When we succeed in changing the logic of the seasons, turn time back in its flight, influence the sea to ignore the pull of the moon in the matter of its tides, and convert the streams from their flow to the ocean, then, and not until then shall we divorce the missionary crusade from the Christian consecration that goes to the fringes of the world in search of the last man, woman and child in the name of Jesus Christ.

The Great Commission does not mean Home Missions. Neither does it mean Foreign Missions. It means Missions, here, there, everywhere—home, foreign, fashionable avenue, city slum, western frontier, jungle wild, desert isolation, wilderness waste-places and metropolitan center, Orient and Occident, near and far, going from sea to sea, island to island, continent to continent, for the Gospel is not racial, peninsular, provincial, sectarian or limited in any way whatsoever. To the contrary, it is inclusive of all people everywhere, irrespective of race, color, tongue or clime.

The missionary enterprise is love in action, love incarnate in men and women of the heroic breed and mien, and it expresses itself in the deeds of a Livingstone, who said "Every land is my Fatherland"; it makes itself felt in the evangel of a John Wesley, who said "The world is my parish." It awaits the plowing and planting and cultivation of the representatives of God and the exponents of His righteousness and the pathfinders of His Kingdom. "No man, having put his hand to the plow and looking back is fit for the Kingdom of God." This love in action expresses itself in the annals of missionary biography and the chronicles of missionary autobiography. And the reason we are so glad and so willing to go into all the world is because the Master of all the world has promised to go with us. Well might we all sing with Watts and make our song a prayer:

"O for this love let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break,
And all harmonious tongues
The Saviour's praises speak!"

Judging Kindly

C. E., B. Y. P. U. and E. L. Matt.
7:1-15

THE word "judging" here does not mean forming an opinion, for we must of necessity form some kind of an opinion concerning the persons we meet and the things we see. No mind is like an uncultivated field. Some kinds of growths are sure to be found therein. No mind is utterly blank. It registers some kind of an impression, good or bad, constructive or destructive. The word "judging" in this particular is used in a censorious sense of judging, condemning, imputing wrong motives.

It is one of the easiest things in the world to judge another unkindly. Better to give everyone the benefit of the doubt than make them the victims of a hasty conclusion. We may make mistakes even with this method, but better to make a mistake on the side of some other's gain rather than loss.

If we were in full possession of all the circumstances that lead to the actions of those of whom we do not approve perhaps our opinion would be justified. We, however, even under those circumstances would not be justified in voicing that opinion. Many a person has been pushed further down the scale of being by the unkind judgment of friends and companions. The better method is to help those who have made a mistake and assist them in every way possible from repeating the error.

"Just stand aside and watch yourself go by,

Think of yourself as 'he' instead of 'I.'
Note closely, as in other men you note
The bag-kneed trousers and the seedy coat.

Pick flaws; find fault; forget the man is you,
And try to make your estimate ring true.

Confront yourself and look you in the eye,
Just stand aside and watch yourself
go by.

"Interpret your motives just as though,
You looked on one whose aims you did not know,

Let undisguised contempt surge through you when,
You see you shrink, O commonest of men.

Despise your cowardice, condemn what-e'er

You note of falseness anywhere.
Defend not one defect that shames your eye—

Just stand aside and watch yourself
go by."

"I sat where they sat," said Ezekiel. He came to find fault. He remained to feel sorrow. Sit where others sit. Take a look at the other side. Think of those poor censorious Pharisees sitting in judgment of the poor woman. Contrast their attitude with the attitude of Jesus. "Let him who is without fault among you cast the first stone." "Woman where are thine accusers?" "All gone? Neither do I condemn thee. Go and sin no more."

Gladstone once forgave a man who had done him an injury. His friends showed surprise. "What are Christians for?" asked the great man. Of course. What are Christians for? "Pray for them that despitefully use you." "Take it to the Lord in prayer." "God turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends." Praying instead of judging is the Christian's attitude. Let us pray. Let God judge.

The original boomerang was a weapon used by the inhabitants of Australia. It consisted of a piece of curved hard wood, which, when thrown by the hand in a certain manner, would come back to the thrower. The world is a boomerang. If you want a friend you must be a friend. Do you want good neighbors? Then be a good neighbor. You do not wish to be judged unkindly? Then do not judge unkindly—for your own sake, but more for the sake of those whom you might wrong.

The Conversion of Saul

International Sunday-School Lesson for July 17

Acts 9:1-19a

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

DECISION DAY is best observed when Christ calls. For Saul of Tarsus, that day was when he was en route from Jerusalem to Damascus and had almost reached his destination. That day the proud pharisee learned that there is a higher law than that which is thought out by men. Even as the manifestation of Christ in His glory was greater than the created sun, so the revelation of our Lord is superior to all human philosophy of life. No paraphrasing of the lesson text can compare with those nineteen verses which are the basis of the lesson study. Commit them to memory, unless you are too old. Go over each portion of the wonderful scene. Visualize that which took place as clearly as you can. Wait, look, think, pray that you, too, may have the Vision Glorious of the Christ within the opened heavens.

Conversion is the great fact of this lesson. Saul began that wonderful day in his life as an enemy of Jesus Christ. Before the sun declined in the heavens, he had seen his Lord and acknowledged Him. In an instant the letters of authority from the Jerusalem Sanhedrin were scraps of paper and the man with a new heart was ready to receive new orders for a new manner of life. He had turned around, which is the literal meaning of "conversion." He had turned from defiance of God to obedience to God. In the light of Saul's experience listen again to the message that Jesus gave to Nicodemus: "Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

While the fullest respect is paid to the differences in individual experiences, it must be noted that when Paul describes the Christian, he says, "Christ in you, the hope of Glory." There is a veritable incarnation of the divine in our heart when we become children of God. Personal salvation is so eternally important that one must not make any mistake. Jesus declared, John 3:18, "he that believeth not hath been judged already, because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God."

Teachers in beginning the preparation of this lesson should consider the individual members of the class who have not made their decision to be Christians. This is your unusually clear opportunity to win these, under the power of the Holy Spirit, to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ. Not only teach the individuals in the class and make your appeal there, but follow up the general seed-sowing by personal and direct interviews. Your pupils are looking for you to do this very thing, and possibly they are wondering why you have waited so long. The business of a salesman is not merely to show goods, but particularly to book orders.

IS YOUR way of life the best way, or even the right way? Many have had time to face such questions when they have been placed in the dark, as Saul was for those three days. We can often think much better in the dark, in times when we are laid aside for a season. Freedom of action can prevent weighing of values. You, dear reader, may right now be a shut-in or be held back from a most cherished desire. Such days can be for you school days with Christ as the Master Teacher. Paul knew that in times of personal weakness he was strongest spiritually. Though he had the thorn in the flesh, he discovered the sufficiency of God's grace.

When Saul was arrested by God outside the walls of Damascus there was great rejoicing by the praying group of Christians within that city. Saul must have been happy even in his blindness to know that never again would his hands be stained with the blood of the "saints." This is a summer-time lesson study and many are journeying in these days. It is fair to ask ourselves these questions: "Will the knowledge of our coming or visit bring joy to others? Are we planning for their good or their discomfort?" The outcome of a journey can be gloriously different from what was expected. Saul took about six days to go from Jerusalem to Damascus. By airship the distance is nearly 140 miles. He failed to make the usual report to the Sanhedrin, but he established the friendship with Jesus Christ which has been growing ever since. His destructive days were over and the constructive ones had begun. He entered Damascus a victor, though blind and led by the hand.

There is nothing to fear from a man who prays right. Saul of the Sanhedrin was doubtless a man of prayer. He was a Jew and worshipped Jehovah. If his prayers were in harmony with his pharisaism they were formal and vicious, for he surely asked help in accord with his letters of earthly authority. How differently he must have praised and petitioned his God after he saw and accepted the Christ as his personal Saviour! He was no longer righteous but a penitent sinner: he would ask Christ to be with and comfort those who were then in the Jerusalem prison because of previous arrests, and then there was the family of Stephen who loved the one whom he had helped to kill. He had time to pray and he prayed. In respect to prayer the statement is true—what one does from love he does differently.

MESSENGERS of Christ may not always be eager to obey, but they must go at the Master's command. When there was work for Ananias, Christ knew where to find him. He could tell this messenger about Saul and name the street where he was abiding. The omniscience of God is stupendously wonderful. Some are silly enough to try and circumvent our heavenly Father, Who knows even our thoughts. Ananias answered, "Behold, I Lord," and soon went forth on a blessed mission to open blind eyes. One young man found his call to the ministry in Isaiah 42:6-7, "I Jehovah have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thy hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the dungeon, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house." It was worth any struggle or cost to witness the falling of the scales from Saul's eyes.

If the biblical order of statement is the chronological one, this one who had obtained saving faith was baptized before he even took food. The Bible clearly teaches an outward acknowledgment of the inward working of divine grace. If you are a man, full grown as was Saul, be manly and make your public confession at once of the miracle which has been wrought in you.

Though Saul was converted at about the age of forty, no license must be taken from this fact. The average age of conversion is at sixteen. Less than three-tenths of one per cent. are converted at forty and the percentage is still less beyond that age. And even if one does accept Christ at forty, a quarter of century of opportunity for blessed service has been lost since the age of fifteen. If you have delayed your decision, delay no longer.

Saul had the habit of being an extreme man. He enjoyed going to the limit. This he did in the former days and now he will still be characteristic, though his will is yielded to the control of his Heavenly Father. Ananias told him of the possibility of being filled with the Holy Spirit, and Saul was ready to receive Him. Saul gave all of his talents to the Triune God. As the great apostle to the Gentiles he became the Moses of the New Testament and led the church from her narrow limits to a world position.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and mortgages—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Désirée

will be sorrow in many a noble house, and the Bastille will receive some distinguished guests. I will tell you the names of those principally implicated: The Duke de Marsan, the Duke de Chaumont, the Count de Rodez, the Count d'Auch, the Viscount de Beauvais, and the Marquis de la Vars. What do you think of that list, M. de Beaujolais?"

"Sire!" I cried excitedly.

"What is it, M. de Beaujolais?"

"The very mention of that last name has restored the memory which had eluded me. I remember years ago visiting, in company with my late father, the château of the Marquis, and being charmed, boy though I was, with his little daughter. Is your Majesty's gracious offer of a reward still open to me?"

"It is still open, M. de Beaujolais."

"Then, sire, I would beg your royal clemency for M. de la Vars—a full pardon, if possible; though on condition, of course, that he pledges himself to engage no more in such plots."

The King laughed softly.

"I consent to your request, M. de Beaujolais. The more willingly because I have reason to believe that M. de la Vars is less culpable than the others. A free pardon is granted—with conditions. This shall be immediately set forth in a letter. Probably you would wish to be yourself the bearer of this letter?"

"With your Majesty's gracious permission," I answered, and it was plain that the King possessed the truly royal gift of reading a man's very thoughts.

"Then I give you leave to depart at once, for my officers are already well on their way to make the arrest."

WITHIN an hour I had left Paris well behind me and riding hard, reached the Château de la Vars towards the close of the second day, arriving hard upon the heels of the King's officers. The great house was in confusion, and I learned that the Marquis had already bidden farewell to his wife and daughter, and was now in the custody of Captain de la Motte, being by his courtesy allowed to make some final arrangements. The two were together when I was announced.

"This is an unexpected honour, M. de Beaujolais," said the Marquis. "I fear I must add, as you will see for yourself, that your visit is untimely."

"Pardon, M. le Marquis, but I venture to think you will find to the contrary," and I handed him the King's sealed letter.

The Marquis read with amazement; then, to my surprise, he looked at me coldly and haughtily, and passed the letter without a word to Captain de la Motte.

He also looked astonished, then laughed.

"You will accept the conditions, I trust, M. le Marquis?" said the Captain. "I must at least consider them," replied M. de la Vars.

"Then I will withdraw for a while," De la Motte said, adding in an undertone, as he passed me—"You must have been born under a lucky star, De Beaujolais."

Somewhat mystified, I waited for the Marquis to speak.

"I understand, M. de Beaujolais, that it is to your influence I am indebted for this conditional pardon."

"I had the good fortune to gain the ear of his Majesty."

"Also that conditions were attached in accordance with your suggestion."

"Certainly, M. le Marquis," I answered, my own demeanor stiffening in response to the haughty manner he saw fit to maintain.

"Mondieu! I am amazed at your presumption, M. de Beaujolais."

"I fail to see the presumption, M. le Marquis. When a sovereign is gracious enough to pardon an offense, it is only fair to expect the offense will not be repeated."

"You must very well know I am not referring to that, but to the further condition."

"The further condition?" I questioned blankly.

"Read that, M. de Beaujolais," said the Marquis, his tone changing at the sight of my evident astonishment, and handing me the King's letter.

UNDERNEATH the formal order for pardon and release I read the following: "This pardon has been granted through the personal intercession of M. de Beaujolais, who attached the wise condition that you should engage to enter into no further plot against me or the Cardinal-Duke. There is also the further condition that you shall forthwith bestow upon M. de Beaujolais the hand of your daughter in marriage. I may point out that there is some advantage to you in this alliance, as although the young man's fortune is small, his advancement is certain owing to the esteem in which he is held both by myself and the Cardinal-Duke."

The reading of this message, though it was so gracious in tone, covered me with confusion.

"I assure you, M. le Marquis, that—that—"

"I see, now, that you had no full knowledge of the conditions," said M. de la Vars, breaking in upon my halting speech with a smile which emboldened me to take advantage of the royal message.

"Yet it is true that his Majesty must have read, by some rare insight, a hope that was in my heart."

"But how can that be, M. de Beaujolais? You have not seen my daughter since you and she were children."

"Pardon, M. le Marquis; but Mademoiselle de la Vars has been lately away from home."

"Yes, on a visit to her aunt."

"It was in the company of the Countess du Bartas I lately met mademoiselle, and was charmed by her beauty."

This was clearly a matter of surprise to the Marquis; but he did not then question me.

"To come to the point, Arnaud," he said, now calling me by my name. "I can have no objection to marrying my daughter to the son of my old friend, and I certainly have no wish to become an inmate of the Bastille; still—"

"I honour your scruples, M. le Marquis," I interrupted eagerly, "but I only beg your permission to at once urge my suit in person. If Mademoiselle de la Vars does not willingly consent, I pledge my honour to return to his Majesty and to do my best to induce him to withdraw the condition."

"Like your late father, you are the very model of chivalry," said the Marquis with a smile. "After my daughter was permitted to take leave of me she retired to the pavilion. Do you remember the way?"

"Perfectly, monsieur," I answered, and was soon hastening through the beautiful gardens to the rose-covered pavilion which I recollected had been her favorite retreat.

"MADEMOISELLE DE LA VARS—Désirée!" I called, and the slender, graceful figure, though not now clad in the garb of a waiting-maid, sprang up, startled, from an attitude of grief.

"You," she cried. "You!"

"Did I not say we should meet again?"

"And you knew—all the time?"

"I knew you were no serving maid, but not who you were until my memory was stirred by the sight of your father's name—in that list."

"So I was doubly fooled, and you have come to triumph in the result of your work," she said resentfully.

"My work?"

"Yes; for had not the Countess been deceived by the false despatch my father would have been warned, and would have fled."

"Do you blame me for doing my duty, Désirée?"

"I cannot blame you for that. Yet—oh! is it generous of you to come and triumph over a girl who was humiliated in doing her best for her father's safety?" And though pride would have restrained her tears they overflowed her beautiful eyes.

"Désirée, I am not so base as you

You Will See

Prettier teeth—safer teeth—in a week

We will send for the asking a new-method tooth paste. Modern authorities advise it. Leading dentists everywhere now urge its daily use.

To millions of people it has brought whiter, safer, cleaner teeth. It will bring them to you and yours. See and feel the delightful results and judge what they mean to you.

Removes the film

It removes the film—that viscous film you feel. No old method ever did that effectively.

Film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It dims the teeth and leads to attacks on them. It is the cause of most tooth troubles. Those troubles have been constantly increasing, because old methods failed to combat film effectively.

These effects will delight you

Pepsodent removes the film. Then it leaves teeth highly polished, so film less easily adheres.

It also multiplies the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva—the factor which digests starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva—the factor which neutralizes acids.

Every application brings these five

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germes breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of internal troubles.

Ways to combat it

Dental science has now found two effective film combatants. Able authorities have amply proved them. Now dentists the world over are urging their adoption effects. The film is combated, Nature's forces are multiplied. The benefits are quickly apparent.

These methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a tooth paste which meets every modern requirement. And a ten-day test is now supplied to everyone who asks.

think. I have come to bring you good news. His Majesty graciously permitted me to name a reward for my service, and I asked that your father should be pardoned."

"You asked that, monsieur—and was it granted?"

"On conditions. But before we enter into that I must speak to you upon another matter. That night at the inn—I said I would ask you to pardon my offence when we again met. I sue for your forgiveness now. Désirée, will you grant it?"

"I—I brought it upon myself," she answered with drooping eyes, her face flushed with the tints of the rose. "Besides, you have procured my father's pardon."

"Upon a certain condition."

"A condition?" she questioned with a quick look of alarm.

"Yes, but you must not blame me. His Majesty, by some means guessing what has, since I met you, become the dearest wish of my heart, attached it without my knowledge."

"What can it be?" she murmured, though the look in her eyes as she gave one quick glance, and her tell-tale blushes seemed to show that she already guessed.

"Désirée, do you not know? Did not that kiss tell you? I am here with your father's consent. If you cannot willingly grant my ardent desire—"

"Yes?" she questioned breathlessly.

"I have pledged my word that I will return to the King and beg him to forego the condition."

"Is it so little to your liking?" she asked with feminine perversity.

"No; but I love you so dearly that I could not force myself upon you."

"It is a long journey back to Paris," she said without looking at me.

"And I should bear with me a heavy heart."

"Would you conceal it so well as you did the despatch?" she laughed.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE ruling desire in the letters received for the Prayer League this week is for a genuine, far-reaching religious revival. These letters are for the most part intensely earnest, and express confidence that the Lord will grant the prayers of His children for an outpouring of the Spirit.

"I wish to send in a request for prayers for a revival of religion in the Woodlawn Baptist Church of Virginia," writes M. W. H. "The church was once prospering."

"I humbly ask that each member of the league may pray for our church, which is one of the leading Baptist churches of Ohio," writes Mrs. A. B. "There has been a faction come up which has caused a division in the church, and the members are at sword's points with one another and the dear old pastor's heart is bowed down with sorrow. Pray that those who are in any way responsible for this catastrophe may see the error of their way, and that we may all be united again. And will you pray for me, that I may be given courage that in some way or somehow, I too might be able to bring souls to God."

Reader, N. H., writes: "Please pray that the M. E. Church in Stark, may be revived and that the young man who is supplying the pulpit may be able to overcome adverse circumstances. Also pray for me that I may have more faith in the midst of trial and anxiety."

A. N. P., Pittsfield, N. H., writes: "Pray for a genuine old-fashioned revival in a country neighborhood, that many souls may be born again. Also pray that sight may be restored to an eye from which a cataract has been removed; that one who is seeking the Light may receive Jesus Christ and be made free; that the right worker may be sent to a country meeting, and pray for a lady in a nervous condition which prevents her from filling a useful position."

"Désirée, do not jest with me, though I may deserve it."

"My father's release would be delayed, and I, ungrateful, would be left with a memory which you have assured me I shall never forget. What a miserable creature I should be!"

Again she laughed; but now with such a look that I snatched her to my arms. This time the kiss was returned to me.

AT THE outset of this narrative I said it was not for a soldier to inquire into the why and wherefore of a duty given him to perform. Though keeping to this rule, I am not without suspicion that the carrying of the despatch with which I had been entrusted, was of less importance than the settling of a wager between his Majesty the King and his Eminence the Cardinal-Duke. I have now reason to believe that the subject of this wager was whether or no an officer so young and inexperienced as myself would be able to withstand certain dangers and temptations.

"From whom did you learn the nature of the despatch I carried?" I once asked Désirée.

"From my aunt, the Countess du Bartas."

"Did you of your own wish play the part of waiting-maid?"

"No, my aunt persuaded me to it, to save my father's liberty, perhaps his life."

Now I have since seen, in the cabinet of the Cardinal-Duke, the names of those employed in his secret service. Some were ladies of high rank, and amongst them the Countess du Bartas.

It has been declared that his Eminence, the greatest master of intrigue, loved it for its own sake, and would often confer his favors by its means. Even if that be so, it is certain that I have no cause to complain.

M. McK., Red Mountain, Canada, writes: "Pray for a mighty revival in our congregation and neighborhood; that our pastor may be filled with the Spirit, and the members brought to a mighty conviction. Pray for my husband to make full surrender, and also for healing and financial aid for a number of friends."

Mrs. C. C., Millwood, Ky., writes: "Pray that the revival to be held here in September may be the greatest this little place has ever known, and that salvation may come to my household."

M. F. L., Albin, Wyo., writes: "Pray that the honest in heart among professed Christians in the whole world may be shown the true Church of Jesus Christ in order that believers may all come to the unity of the faith and believe and speak the same doctrine."

"Please enter me on your prayer list," writes Mrs. P. W. U., "that God will give me strength and knowledge to have a part in establishing His Kingdom on earth."

H. P., Silver Point, Tenn., writes: "A few years ago I asked you to pray for a boy who in a drunken state killed his father. He was then in prison. They have now pardoned him and he is coming home. While he was in there these many years he made a model prisoner. Pray earnestly that he may not enter into temptation but become a good Christian boy. I know it is through prayer that this has been brought about. I can not express my gratitude to you and God. He can do wonderful things for us when we ask Him. And I would also ask you to pray for a big revival here in the next weeks."

A. M. T., N. Y., writes: "Pray for my only son, that he may forsake his evil ways; also pray that I may be cured of cancer."

E. F. W., Willimantic, Conn., asks prayers that her little adopted son, who has been stolen, may be located and returned.

A Mother and Wife request the prayers of the league for a beloved son and for a husband who has been addicted to the drug habit. They write: "He is free from it now, and we request the earnest prayers of the League that he may never return to it."

HEART STORIES

A NEW BOOK OF SEVEN STORIES

By Dr. Charles M. Sheldon
author of "IN HIS STEPS"

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled, 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the "Good Fight," who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold in "As Heaven Views It," whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in "Why the Minister Remained"; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in "Of Such Is the Kingdom" and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; "Sunrise on the Mesa" is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; "His Christmas Gift" is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled "Guests of Honor," in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, "In His Steps," should read this new book.

not a logical or a satisfactory adjustment of soldier compensation claims and that the whole question has not been sufficiently considered.

Greece Less Aggressive

APPARENTLY Greece is ready to think again before undertaking her proposed offensive against the Turkish Nationalists in Anatolia. According to the latest dispatches from Athens the government is willing to accept in principle at least, the offers of mediation by Great Britain, France and Italy. The cabinet is not inclined to commit itself formally to the proposal until it learns the conditions on which the peace pourparlers would be based. In London and Paris there is no longer a feeling of uneasiness over the Near East, however, because of the certainty that Greece could not ignore any reasonable basis for negotiations presented by the three dominant powers. A final refusal to meet the Turks at the council table would, in the circumstances, mean the withdrawal of all Allied support from her.

King Opens Ulster Parliament

KING GEORGE'S decision to go to Belfast for the formal opening of the new Parliament of North Ireland had caused many misgivings, but the visit of the King and Queen to the Ulster capital was marred by no disorders. On the contrary, there was sincere enthusiasm in the greeting which they received in their three-mile procession through the Belfast streets between lines of sprafel-helmeted pickets; and while Sinn Fein quarters hung out no flags the cheers for the royal visitors were not confined to the Unionists.

The King's speech from the throne was designed to reach a broader audience than the constituents of the Ulster parliament and contained an appeal that the grant of self-government to these six counties should be the stepping-stone to an Irish settlement. He spoke of the earnest desire throughout the English-speaking world for a satisfactory solution of the age-old Irish problems, and voiced a wish that in Southern Ireland a Parliament might soon be established. "The future lies in the hands of the Irish people themselves," he said in conclusion. "May this historic gathering be the prelude of the day on which the Irish people of the North and South, under one parliament or two as those parliaments may themselves decide, shall work together in common love for Ireland upon the sure foundation of mutual respect and justice."

20,000 Sign Church Peace Union Petition

MORE than 20,000 clergymen had signed a monster petition appealing for steps toward an international conference on reductions of armaments "at the earliest possible date" which was presented to President Harding by a delegation from the Church Peace Union. The petition bore the endorsement of the Federal Council, of the Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Council, the United Synagogue of America and the Central Conference of American Rabbis, and among the signers were representatives of almost all denominations.

Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, of New York, who was chairman of the delegation, told the President in presenting the petition that no other document of the same representative value in the disarmament movement ever had been presented. President Harding was quoted as replying that he hoped eventually to carry out the request, although the process could not be carried forward as rapidly as many people would like to see it. He added that the United States must have a general agreement regarding armaments before it could afford to permit its own to be reduced to too low a point.

NAVAL TUG CARRYING 43 GIVEN UP AS LOST. The Navy Department, after weeks of searching, has given up as lost the naval tug Conestoga, which left Mare Island, Calif., on March 23 for Samoa. Her crew consisted of 39 enlisted men, three warrant officers and one officer.

Christian Endeavor on the Side

dawn for the men about to press forward into the front line. In the Canadian and British armies there were numberless prayer groups held by the Endeavorers in the trenches and even at the front itself for their mutual help and encouragement, and for the men who had not yet consecrated their lives.

Since the Northwest has been mentioned, notice might be taken of a Christian Endeavor oddity in the work among the logging camps. The State of Oregon furnishes and maintains libraries in these out-of-the-way sections. Similarly there is a definite work carried on by the Endeavor movement in the logging centers in Maine and in the Adirondacks.

OF COURSE all work and no play is as unhealthy for an organization as an individual. Gradually there has grown a recognition of the value in fellowship in recreation among Christian people, and in Endeavor activities there is a growing tendency to provide wholesome recreation for the union workers and leaders, at once cementing their associations in the work, refreshing and rekindling their enthusiasm, and at the same time recruiting and enthusing new officers and newly drafted workers for the various activities.

Perhaps the lead in this direction has been taken in the holiday home scheme of the British Endeavorers. To provide for a holiday home, stock is issued and sold to the individuals. The homes are operated at a slight profit, so there is actually a tiny dividend to shareholders.

Here members of the societies may spend their vacations, and in England a definite effort is made to promote international fellowship through carefully arranged invitations to leading figures in the Endeavor work from the continent.

In America an arrangement for week-end parties has grown up in connection with the Fresh Air Camps. The Philadelphia Union divides the week-end before and after the Fresh-Air work season among the eight branch unions, which in turn give the opportunity for the outing to the branch officers. From early spring until late fall, weather permitting, the camp is the scene of many joyous and happy times for the young people.

The Brooklyn camp at Huntington, L. I., is similarly used by the union officers of that city. The six Brooklyn districts have each an opportunity for a week-end, and at other times parties are made up of other groups of Endeavorers. The Brooklyn organization always makes a point of including some few individuals who may be expected to become contributors to the work, and at the Brooklyn camp the parties are always largely groups of workers—the boys chopping trees and cutting up firewood, repainting the buildings in and out—the girls helping in a way that hardly stamps them as the inferior sex.

Christian Endeavor is an organization of youth. Youth, healthy, is irrepressible. The movement itself, directing the bubbling spirits of its members, yet loses none of that quality of irrepressibility. It is a forty-years-young infant, lusty indeed.

One of the Keds sport shoes. Excellent for tennis, canoeing, sailing. High or low.

One of the new Keds pumps. Either with a heel or without, also with ankle strap. Very trim and neat looking.

One of the children's Keds—made on Nature last. For dress up or play. There are also oxfords, sandals and high shoes for children in the Keds line.

One of the leather trimmed Keds. With either brown or white leather. Welt construction sole of rubber composition. Very popular.

Shoes can make such a difference in a summer

EVERYONE is discovering that canvas rubber-soled shoes—originally designed for sport—are just the thing for everyday wear. What a difference they make!

When you are taking life easy—sauntering to the mail, visiting with a neighbor, working about the house, they are so restful, so neat, so cool-looking. They give you the relaxation you wish in warm weather.

When you are really exercising—tennis, canoeing, sailing, walking, how much quicker, lighter, more agile they make you.

Keds will give you a new idea of canvas rubber-soled shoes. You will notice the difference right away. There is a shapeliness in the last, a fineness in the quality of the canvas and the rubber, a sturdiness of construction that makes them hold their shape.

There are many kinds of Keds—pumps, oxfords, high shoes and low. There are also many for men and boys.

You can get the style you wish at your dealer's. If he does not carry them he will secure them for you.

Keds were originated and are made only by the United States Rubber Company. The name is marked on every pair.

Keds

Not all canvas rubber-soled shoes are Keds. Keds are made only by the United States Rubber Company. Look for the name Keds on the shoes.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any questions addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters, nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

IN a recent short editorial, the prophet Joel was mentioned when Micah should have been quoted instead. A number of our readers have good-naturedly called attention to the mistake, an indication that the Christian Herald readers know their Bibles pretty thoroughly. We thank them for writing and gladly take this opportunity to make the correction.

Regular Subscriber. There are sins which you need not confess except to God alone, and this we take to be applicable to the case mentioned in your letter. The world is only too quick to take away the reputation of anyone. Do your whole duty as you understand it, and look to God for His help and blessing.

H. L. B., Allensville, Ky. The passage in Luke 8: 18, "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have," carries in reference Bibles this variant in the margin: "shall be taken even that which he thinketh that he hath." In the verses immediately preceding, Jesus had been impressing His hearers with the need of being diligent and active in spiritual things, lest their opportunities be given to others who would make better use of them, and lest they, through indifference and neglect, forfeit all contact with the work of advancing the Kingdom. This would be a judicial retribution visited upon carelessness and incompetency.

M. S. F., Poplar Ridge, N. Y. Jesus warned His followers that in the latter days false guides would arise, whose teachings would be so subtle and alluring that they would if possible "deceive even the very elect." The world is full of such false guides today. It is a wise plan to let them alone. If any doctrine is of God, it will stand the test of opposition and investigation. If not of God, it will pass away and nothing can make it endure.

E. M. S., Pasadena Calif., writes: "In the Mail Bag of April 16, were two letters that interested me very much. One assured us we could not have world-wide peace until Christ, the Prince of Peace, returned and made peace. The other suggested we might have peace and good-will, if we only remembered Christ and His teachings in all our relationships. Much has been made of the fact that when Christ came the first time, there was peace, but it was an armed peace and many, many people were slaves, and the peace could not last. When He comes again there will be peace, and it will not be an armed peace, and there will be no slavery of any kind; but there will be the spirit of self-sacrifice in large measure and the peace will last. It would not have been best for the early disciples of Jesus to have been told that it would be centuries before the return of their loved Teacher, but now to a 'grown-up race,' after nineteen hundred years of Christian teaching—teaching that has gone far beyond the membership of the church—God can encourage them to finish carrying out the commission of Jesus, taking the Gospel and His teaching to every one."

Arthur Meachen of Norwalk, England, writes: "A little leaflet touched the heart of John Bunyan and as a result (by God's grace) we have 'Pilgrim's Progress,' which has been translated into 115 languages, and read the world over. Dr. Marsham of India said that portions of scripture and tracts had something to do with the conversion of almost every individual who joined the Christian communion in India. Mr. D. L. Moody had half a million tracts distributed at the World's Fair in Chicago. Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, when a boy, was constrained to come to Jesus, by a tract left on the table by his mother. Tract and Gospel literature distributors, take courage and continue to go forward."

A. P., Quebec, Can., writes: "May I say a few words to corroborate C. B. Day's statements in regard to the thought: 'God's in His heaven; all's right with the world.' No Christian has the right to use that statement to lull any one to sleep. We have no right to use God's omnipotence as a cloak for our own indifference to world conditions and for our neglect of duty. If I thought, as some people do, that God willed children to be born under the terrible conditions of our large cities (I say it reverently) I could not worship Him; but some Christians seem to be able to do so, though how they can is a mystery to me. Short-sighted Christians are very numerous, and it is soothing to think that they do not have to accept too much responsibility, and that they can just jog along in the old rut, because 'God's in his heaven,' and therefore conditions, as they are, must be what He wills. So they accept the inevitable, take things as they are and cling to the traditions of their own particular denomination. Hence we still have Methodists, Baptists, etc., instead of having one Protestant church teaching the world the fundamental truths of the Bible. We should use our God-given reason to give ourselves a vision of possible reforms and then do them—not rest on the Lord all the time. One word as to disarmament. Why cut off the branch and not pull up the tree of discord by the roots? Disarmament is the proper thing, but wars will never cease until the old root, covetousness, is removed from the heart of every nation on the globe. Solve the problem of how that is to be done, and you will have peace on earth."

Our friend's judgment, though sound, is possibly just a little too severe. Browning's line, to which he refers, is used, as far as our observation goes, rather to stimulate courage and faith in the Divine wisdom and overruling direction, than to belittle the real evils we have to face, and to make God responsible for bad world conditions. We quite agree with the spirit of his remarks, however, and especially his suggestions on Christian Unity and World peace.

E. D. P., Washington, D. C., writes: "In a recent issue a writer seems to question the Bible statement that the mustard seed is not the smallest of all seeds. Many of your readers who have lived in the country will know the wild mustard, which is without doubt the smallest seed in use. I remember in childhood days seeing my mother preparing this seed (which was then a product of our kitchen garden) for the table. It not only was tiny but very dark in color, quite unlike the mustard seed used in pickles and other cookery."

"Troubled Soul," Santa Rosa, Calif. There is none without sin. Yet although through over-confidence in our own strength we may slip, He will not allow us to utterly fall, if we put our trust in Him. Sincere repentance and confession will bring forgiveness, for He is faithful who has promised.

U. J., McDougal, Ark. The passage in Revelation 5: 6, which refers to "The seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth," is interpreted to symbolize the intensified or seven-fold energy of the Holy Spirit in labors that will go on unceasingly to the end. "Send forth" is akin to the commissioning of the apostles.

Subscriber, Saranac Lake, N. Y., writes: "Your daily lesson on 'The Struggle for the Heights,' gave me a desire to sketch an incident in my own experience which has never left me. I was privileged to climb one of our highest mountains and see the sunrise. This day we had our supper mid-way, beside a lovely stream, and made a quiet shelter for the night. We were awakened about three o'clock a. m. for our climb. Dull and sleepy, we were none too anxious for a climb in the dark; but we started, and as we ascended, a faint, rosy hue was touching the tops of trees and rocks. We had to scramble then, to be in time—but such a reward. Every rock and tree, the stream and the whole valley were aglow with the ruby splendor of the morning. I stood awed and speechless with the wonder! It strengthened my faith in God, made me feel it was worth-while coming out of the Valley of Doubt, into His promises of the glory which await those who do try to struggle for the heights."

A. K., Turlock, Calif. The development of Palestine and its progress under the mandate is thus far in the experimental stage. Even the leaders have not reached an agreement on a definite program. Many complicated questions are involved and we are watching developments closely.

Why Your NERVES BLOW UP

How to Prevent It

The Value of Bible Study

IT IS a fact well attested that among the greatest minds this nation has produced, there are comparatively few who have not drawn their principal inspiration from the Bible. Lincoln had studied it from boyhood and its influence was reflected in many ways in his later career. It gave to his addresses a forceful eloquence which caused them to be remembered. McKinley and Roosevelt also owed much of their best qualities in public life to the fact that they studied the Word. And now President Harding, in a recent letter approving the work of a Chicago Bible distributing organization, wrote of the value of Bible study in these unqualified words:

"I have always believed in the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, whereby they have become the expression to men of the word and will of God. I believe that from every point of view the study of the Bible is one of the most worthy to which men may devote themselves, and that in proportion as they know and understand it, their lives and actions will be better."

It would be interesting to know to what extent the members of our present Congress have studied the Bible, and in what measure it has been a spur to their eloquence with both voice and pen, and a counselor in times of emergency. The public man who has never studied the Bible has missed much that would have contributed to the real success of his career, while he who has drunk deep at its springs of wisdom, finds it applicable to every emergency, and is not ashamed to tell the world how much he is debtor to it for the greatest triumphs that have come to him in the battle of life.

That Bible study is much more popular today than formerly, we think can not be questioned. There are great multitudes, even outside of Bible schools and classes, who find God's Word a source of comfort and blessing, a safe Guide through all the vicissitudes of life, a revelation of Divine love and forgiveness, with assurance of the life to come.

The Famous Christian Herald RED LETTER BIBLES

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages, quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.

2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.

3. A Red Star (*) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

The Christian Herald Red Letter Bible Contains

919 pages for the Old Testament
284 " for the New Testament

Printed on American Bible Paper

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle to the Holy Scriptures.

The text is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Bible Leather, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, with silk ribbon marker, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market.

Important Kitchen Hints—Very Interesting to Every Housewife in America

creased so that home prepared flour will make a lighter and finer grained cake.

If your recipe calls for 4 eggs to 1 quart of milk, use 3 eggs, and for the egg omitted use  $\frac{1}{2}$  tablespoonful of Argo Corn Starch. For lighter, flakier biscuits, pie crusts and muffins, make your pastry flour with  $\frac{1}{4}$  cup of Argo and one cup of wheat flour. A little Argo Corn Starch dusted on top of cakes before icing prevents the frosting from running off.

A quarter teaspoonful of Argo put into each of your salt-shakers will keep the salt from caking.

|-----------------------------------|-----------------------------------------|
| $\frac{1}{2}$ cup Flour           | 2 Yolks of Eggs                         |
| 2 tablespoonfuls Argo Corn Starch | $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoonful Baking Powder |
| 1 tablespoonful Sugar             | $\frac{1}{4}$ Lemon Rind (grated)       |
| 1 tablespoonful Karo              | $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonful Salt          |
| 1 tablespoonful Mazola            |                                         |

Sift flour, cornstarch, salt, and baking powder in a bowl, add Karo, sugar, Mazola, and yolks with the lemon, mix all with hand to a round ball and smooth. Roll out very thin, cut in shapes, brush over with the white of egg, and sprinkle chopped nuts and granulated sugar over top; bake in medium hot oven till done.

|---------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------|
| $\frac{1}{2}$ cup Boiling Water | 1 cup Flour, which includes                   |
| 4 tablespoons Mazola            | $\frac{1}{2}$ tablespoons of Argo Corn Starch |
| 2 Eggs                          |                                               |

Put Mazola and boiling water in saucepan, add the flour and cornstarch well mixed, all at once, and cook till it leaves the side of the pan. Remove from the fire, cool by beating, and when cold, beat in, one at a time, the unbeaten eggs. Line a baking sheet with oiled paper. Drop the batter in rounds on it and bake in a hot oven for thirty minutes. When cold split and fill with whipped cream or the cream filling.

| $\frac{1}{2}$ tablespoons Argo Corn Starch | 1 Egg—Yolk only    |
| 1 pinch of Salt                            | 1 teaspoon Vanilla |
| 1 cup Milk                                 | 1 tablespoon Karo  |

Mix the cornstarch and the salt, and mix to a smooth paste with one-fourth of a cup of the milk. Scald the rest of the milk, and add to the cornstarch. Cook in a double boiler twenty minutes. Add the beaten yolk of the egg, and cook long enough to set. Remove from the fire and add the vanilla and Karo. If the mixture has been carefully stirred while thickening it will be smooth. If lumpy, strain; cool and fill the cold puffs.

| 6 level tablespoonfuls Argo Corn Starch | $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon Salt | 1 teaspoon Vanilla |

Mix the cornstarch with a little cold milk. Stir the hot milk slowly into the cornstarch, and stir over water till it thickens. Cook eight minutes. Beat the eggs slightly, add the sugar and salt. Add the cornstarch mixture to the eggs, and cook, stirring constantly, one minute longer. Remove from fire, add the vanilla. Serve cold with cream and sugar. Top with cherries. (Serve six persons).

For smoother gravies and sauces use a dessert spoonful of Argo Corn Starch, instead of a tablespoonful of wheat flour

EVERY little while, at some banquet or function, a new use for Argo Corn Starch is discovered, that never before was known. There doesn't seem to be any end to the number of combinations you can make with this delectable energy food.

Everybody, from the oldest to the youngest, likes good things made with Argo Corn Starch. One reason, undoubtedly, is because Argo supplies a natural craving of the human system. Every bit of Argo Corn Starch is transformed into Dextrose, and is taken right up into the blood—to give you strength and increase your energy.

It's no wonder that boys and girls that get plenty of Argo puddings, cookies, ice cream and custards are so full of life and vigor!

Important Kitchen Hints

It is not necessary to purchase both a bread and a pastry flour. By using  $\frac{1}{4}$  cup of Argo Corn Starch to each cup of bread flour the percentage of gluten is decreased and the starch content in-

Two Masterpieces of Russian Art

LOVERS of religious art are keenly concerned over the fate of some of the best works of celebrated masters which formerly hung in the famous Russian galleries.

Besides the wonderful gallery of the Hermitage in Petrograd, where were housed many of the best works of the most celebrated painters of all the world, there is the Alexander III Museum of Modern Art, which housed only Russian pictures. Here hung the picture, "Martha and Mary," by H. Semiradsky, shown above. The "Christ in the Temple," by V. D. Polyenov, is among the collection left to the city of Moscow by the brothers Tretiakov, wealthy linen merchants. In the Tretiakov Gallery were over two thousand paintings, among them the most characteristic of all Russian art. The subjects were largely from peasant life and, as one would expect in Russia, largely religious.

What has happened to these wonderful pictures since 1917 is purely conjecture. Some of the old art galleries are being maintained by the Communists, but many of them have been completely dismantled.

The Monastery of Mar-Saba, twelve desert miles from Jerusalem in the historic valley of the Brook Kidron, founded in the fifth century after Christ and maintained despite many Moslem massacres

Mar-Saba, the Ancient

A Visit to a Monastery Near Jerusalem, Which Has Sheltered Many Christian Heroes

By DR. THOMAS E. GREEN

IN ALL the Orient, near or far, there is no one place possessed of more weird interest than is the Monastery of Mar-Saba, which is about twelve long desert miles below Jerusalem, in the valley of the Brook Kidron.

In the days when Syria was making, and natural forces were moulding the face of the earth, vast and surging torrents must have flung themselves down from every direction into the yawning sink that in time became the mysterious Dead Sea. At any rate these towering limestone hills, forming an almost mountainous chain from north to south through the wilderness of Judea, are cut and gashed with deep and rugged chasms. Most of them are dry save during the period of the great rains on which Palestine depends for what she retains of her ancient verdure. Two only have steady streams, small and trickling though they are.

The one is the Brook Cherith, in whose wild and titanic fastness the Prophet Elijah hid from his pursuing enemies. The other is the Kidron, whose deep gorge lying between Mt. Zion and the Mount of Olives was the theater of much of Bible story, the valley growing wilder and deeper as it cuts the hills to the south, until it opens at last, twenty miles or more from the city, into the level of the Dead Sea, 1292 feet below the Mediterranean. Twelve miles from Jerusalem in the midst of scenery as grand and wild as it is barren and desolate, is the Monastery—one of the most marvelous places that human ingenuity ever contrived for a dwelling-place.

Full of interest as it is, it is not included in the ordinary program of tourist sightseeing, alike because of the extreme difficulty of the journey, and from the fact that admission can only be obtained from the office of the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem. This is not always easy to obtain, for the Monastery is an ecclesiastical penitentiary where recalcitrant monks and clergy are sent, either to do penance for some fault or to develop in its enforced solitude, the necessary strength for some duty. At times the Monastery is closed for weeks at a time to all visitors. We were fortunate in obtaining the required permission, during a visit to the Patriarch, his Beatitude Damianos, at the great convent on the Mount of Olives.

IN ORDER that no possible circumstance might interfere with our visit, we prepared to start at once. Early the next morning, in order to escape as much as possible the extreme heat of the day, we mounted our sure-footed donkeys, and leaving by the Joppa Gate, picked our way down the steep path that leads to the bottom of the great ravine.

It was a glorious morning, the blue Palestinian sky without a fleck. A gentle breeze stirred the palm leaves and olive branches, in the old gardens, surrounded by ruined walls, where wells and fountains made life and growth a possibility. Our trail, for one could not call the narrow, stony path a road, wound down into the valley of Hinnon, that formed in ancient days the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, and was as a sort of No-Man's land, the scene of the periodic lapses into heathenism to which the people were addicted.

DR. GREEN is a clergyman, author, lecturer and world-traveler who for the last few years has been director of the speakers' bureau of the American Red Cross and one of the most forceful of its executives. Among his books are: "The City of Peace," "The Truth About Japan," and "Benares, the Holy." He is especially well acquainted with the Holy Land and the Far East, and he promises us other articles for publication in the autumn.

For this reason it has always been and is still considered a place accursed, and it was here that the thirty pieces of silver that Judas cast back at the feet of the Chief Priests were expended in purchasing what is still called "The Field of Blood."

Turning here into the broader Kidron valley, we found for several miles a smooth and easy way. The sun had not yet risen over the towering hills to the eastward. Along the level shelves at the bottom of the gorge the watered gardens were green and beautiful, their foliage sparkling with the dew, that now as in the days of the poet-king "falls soft upon the hill of Zion."

All about us were scenes each of which might be a pictured chapter of the storied past. Here were two women grinding at a mill, singing in rhythm with the revolving stone, as they made ready a "measure of meal" for the day's food. Here a shepherd, leading his sheep from the fold where they had been guarded for the night, playing on his shrill-toned pipe the shepherd's song, that the sheep know and will follow. Here an oil press, into which two swarthy Syrians were pouring baskets of the diminutive fruit of the silver-leaved trees. Here two early travelers, on foot, their robes gathered up and girt about their waists, with scrip and staff in hand as they might have trod the highway three thousand years ago.

OUR donkeys cantered briskly and comfortably along, the "boys" stick in hand running beside them with the easy stride of unencumbered vigor. It was all so much in harmony with traditional ideals—all so exactly in time with its environment, that the natural impulse was to improvise a melody and sing one of David's Psalms—as they had doubtless been sung myriads of times, along this same highway "that leadeth from the city."

Soon, however, our way turned, and we began to climb the steep-rugged bank, out of the verdure and the morning cool, up into the desolate wilderness and the withering heat of the day. Nothing can be more barren, more hopelessly dry and dead, than these vast empty hills about Jerusalem. And yet when the early and the later rains come, with their life-giving show-

The Anglo-Japanese Treaty

JAPAN has consented, according to advices from London where the British Imperial Conference is in progress, to delay the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance from July until October. The delay, ostensibly is for the purpose of learning the attitude of the American Government toward the terms and condition of the treaty. This postponement is in line with suggestions made frequently by both British and American publicists, who insist that the interests of the United States in the Pacific are of such importance that no agreement on matters affecting that basin should be completed without our approval.

To this suggestion, in which Japan apparently has acquiesced, it might be well to add that no treaty affecting the Pacific should be signed without first giving to both the United States and China the opportunity to present their views. No nation in the world is more vitally interested in any new re-approachment in the Pacific than China. It is conceivable that the whole future of the new Republic will be decided by the terms of the treaty to be negotiated between Japan and England—if it is completed without consultation with the Washington and Peking governments. Great Britain has one paramount interest in Asia, and that is India. Japan has one paramount policy to which her ruling group is committed—the Japanization of all the Eastern Asian mainland. With the diplomatists of the two powers—let alone—there would be an understanding for the protection of British interests in India, and a declaration for the status quo in China, where the notorious “twenty-one demands” and the Shantung award have given tremendous leverage to Japan. This at any rate has been the history of the Anglo-Japanese alliance; it has in its original text and its two renewals recognized the status quo at the date of signature, as witness Korea. The first treaty (June 30, 1902) contains this clause: “The High Contracting parties, having mutually recognized the independence of China and Korea, declare themselves to be entirely uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country.”

In 1904 Korea and Japan signed a treaty of alliance in which Japan guaranteed the integrity of the former.

In 1905 Japan took over virtual contract of the Korean government under a “protectorate” recognized by Great Britain in the second treaty. Annexation was completed in 1910 when Korea became a Japanese colony as “Chosen” and in the renewal of 1911 all reference to the fate of the little kingdom was omitted, the treaty thereby tacitly approving its annexation.

China naturally wants to guard against a repetition of the Korean “infiltration” which ended in saturation and ultimate absorption by Japan. They feel they can effectively guard themselves against this fate if they, with the United States, are permitted to have a voice in the discussion of the new alliance. Minister Sze, in an address at Atlantic City, forcefully emphasizes this demand, and in it he is supported by a large body of American opinion.

Christian Unity in Canada

AN EVENT that comes with the suddenness of a great surprise is the decision of the Presbyterian church in Canada to unite with the Methodist and Congregational churches in the Dominion. This step, which was not taken until the whole question had been thoroughly canvassed, is regarded as one of the most important, both in the historic and the religious sense, in the memory of the oldest Canadians now living. The Montreal Witness says:

“It has given Protestantism an electric shock, and set it guessing with itself as to whether it is not obstructing the way of the Lord by perpetrating unwarranted divisions, and by hanging fire when the summons has come to high endeavor. The order is to ‘lay aside every weight,’ and the tug-of-war between denominations has surely been a leading disability. This antagonism or rivalry has been the worst condemnation of Christianity in the world.” The same journal adds that the great Anglican communion, which has always made Christian Unity a prominent doctrine, feels left out and will not willingly remain outside the new movement.

Among the three great bodies which are now preparing to unite, it has been found that there are no fundamental differences of belief. Such other differences as exist are non-vital, and it is believed they can be harmonized for fellowship's sake.

Canada, we are told, shared the opinion widely held in the United States that the great Church Forward Movement of a year ago had been a setback to Christian Unity, and would probably postpone it for many years. We know that here also many good people regretfully held the same opinion. It is now apparent, however, that the great problem of unity, far from being weakened to silence, has really been gathering strength. It is neither dying nor decadent. We can not direct the ways nor set limits to the power of the Holy Spirit, and the miracle that is now taking place among our northern neighbors may soon appear in our own churches. Christians must get together, if the Church is ever to carry out its high mission in the true spirit of Christian fellowship and co-operation.

Beer as Medicine?

CONGRESS has been getting posted lately on the medicinal properties of beer. It has “seen a light” which has effectively informed the legislative mind on two points: the first, that beer has no qualifications whatsoever as a health-builder, and the second, that its manufacture and sale is a game so lucrative for the brewer and the retailer as to have none of the aspects of a fair business proposition. Some would even call it a colossal humbug.

On June 3, a letter containing the following information was sent to Mr. Volstead by a friend of prohibition in New York City:

“Some years ago, a German chemist was brought to New York by a certain brewing company. Said chemist was brought to make beer without malt or hops. A five-year contract, at a salary of $10,000 a year, was arranged. When said chemist had been two years here, the brewery company had found out his formula for the making of beer without malt or hops, so they discharged him. The chemist then brought suit in the Supreme Court in New York City for the sum of $30,000, being the balance of the contract. He stated, under oath, that the beer was manufactured at a cost of less than 1c. per gallon! He also told how many hundreds of thousands of gallons he had made during the two years while he was in the employ of the company. He made samples in court of the said beer. He won his suit and the brewing company paid him $30,000, and the costs of the suit. This is the stuff brewers and quack doctors want Congress to legalize. Ninety per cent. of the best physicians in the United States do not prescribe beer as medicine—because it isn't!”

This illuminating statement, our informant adds, was forwarded to Mr. Volstead, accompanied by the request that he give the facts to the Judiciary Committee and to Congress, which he evidently has done without loss of time.

Two Letters from Pueblo

Mr. Graham Patterson,
Bible House, New York City.

Dear Mr. Patterson:

Your telegrams and letter received few days ago. We sincerely thank you for your kind offer of assistance in this time of suffering and great need.

Words cannot describe the awful destruction the recent flood carried with it.

I have conferred with the Mayor, and have also gone carefully over the list of Christian Herald subscribers. I know of none of the Herald subscribers that are in special need. Our work here of caring for the flood sufferers is in the hands of the Red Cross, and is being well done.

We shall hold your offer in reserve and if we find that we specially need it or a part of it, we shall let you know.

Thanking you again for your kindness and sympathy, I am Most sincerely, (signed) C. M. BENIGHT.

Pueblo, Colo., June 17, 1921.

Dear Christian Herald:

I've just been taking a breathing space and picked up your issue of June 25, noting your message to Pueblo.

The ninety-first psalm sang itself to me on the never-to-be-forgotten night of June 3 and my faith in God is immeasurably strengthened. Now the personal touch in your message to your subscribers adds to my increasing faith in my fellow men, and I just wanted to thank you.

My family was spared and our loss nothing. The awful havoc wrought by the waters cannot be exaggerated. Opportunity and privilege to help lift another's load is on every hand. Again I thank you for turning from a publication I prized into friends I love.

MRS. E. M. VINING.

The President's Spur

RESPONDING to an appeal from President Harding, who, in a letter to the Republican leader in the House, Mr. Mondell, had expressed his desire for favorable action on disarmament, that body on June 29 adopted by an almost unanimous vote the Borah amendment to the Naval Appropriation Bill, calling upon the President to invite the governments of Great Britain and Japan to unite with our government in a conference to consider a reduction of naval expenditures and building programs for a period of five years. This will probably be followed by the passage of the bill.

One of the latest and most conclusive arguments for the reduction of armaments to a peace basis is that advanced by General Smuts, in a recent speech in London. He pointed out that Germany, notwithstanding the burden of indemnity, now that her military strength has been reduced to 100,000 men on a straight peace basis, has the lightest handicap of any European nation, while her former enemies, still loaded down with their costly incumbrance of armaments, are so handicapped that in the long run their post-war policy will be practically lost altogether. Therefore, in an economic sense, he declared, Germany though beaten in the field, will have won the fruits of victory.

More than any other nation, the United States has the power to avert such a disastrous ending to the whole matter. Our waste of precious time in interminable discussion on armaments and on the peace resolution in Congress, has been justly rebuked by the President who wrote in his letter to Mr. Mondell: “I am vastly more concerned with the favorable attitude of Congress on this question than with the form of expressing that attitude.” He, as well as others with far-sight on big international questions, saw that our indifference and delays were inviting serious danger. Not only Europe's waiting attitude, but the expectations of our own people that the oppressive burden of unnecessary taxation may be lightened, should urge us to the adoption of a policy fully suited to the emergency. Where we lead Europe will follow, in any step that may be taken in the right direction.

We are making progress toward world peace and disarmament, but it remains yet to be demonstrated whether it is the kind of progress that makes for history, or the sort that gets nowhere and is soon forgotten.

A Hide and a Shoe

IT HAS been said that the entire industrial problem is wrapped up in a cowhide and a pair of shoes made out of it. Let us see about that.

A farmer takes a good-sized cowhide to market and gets $1 for it. He then steps across the street and buys himself a pair of shoes made out of a cowhide, just like the one he has sold, and he pays $8 for the shoes.

What has happened to make such a difference between the price paid for a cowhide out of which at least six pairs of shoes could be made, and the price which the farmer must pay for one pair, or one-sixth of the cowhide? Several things have happened.

The cowhide must be tanned and put in shape to make into shoes. The leather then passes through certain hands in trade before it reaches the shoe manufacturer. The shoe man has in his employ, we will say, several hundred men, each group of which does a certain fixed amount of work each day and on a certain part of the shoe. Add also to the leather what are known as “findings,” cloth, the metal hooks around which the shoestrings are wound, and the polish which finally makes the shoe marketable.

But the matter of the wages paid to the different workmen in these different factories and then to the actual makers of the shoes, together with the hours of labor spent in the making added to the overhead expense of the shoe manufacturer, added to the profit he and all the other manufacturers demand for carrying on the business of making shoes do not explain to the political scientist the great difference between the price paid the farmer for the cowhide and the price he had to pay for one pair of shoes made out of it. Eight times as much is too much. Especially when we remember that the farmer is not paying eight times as much for a cowhide that makes one pair of shoes, but for a hide that makes six pairs of shoes.

How proud old Brindle must be to think that although her hide is worth only $1 in the market, yet when she has been made into shoes for the farmer her hide is worth forty-eight times as much! So! Bossy! Stand still while the political economists figure out the cause. For it is beyond the intellect of Old Man Ultimate Consumer!

House Adopts Disarmament Proposal After President Asks Action

AN APPEAL by President Harding to Congress for an expression of opinion favorable to the limitation of armaments through international agreement was followed quickly in the House by the adoption of the Borah amendment to the Naval Appropriation bill. The vote was almost unanimous, 330 to 4, and the chief criticisms of the proposal were due to the fact that the conference which it suggests is limited to the United States, Great Britain and Japan, instead of embracing all nations and that it concerns only naval armaments.

In his appeal to Congress, which was addressed to Mr. Mondell, the House Republican leader, President Harding said he was vastly more concerned with the favorable attitude of Congress regarding disarmament than with the form of expressing that attitude. "I think it has been pretty well understood," the President wrote, "that the administrative branch of the government has already been seeking information with regard to the attitude of foreign nations on the general subject of disarmament. These inquiries and negotiations will be continued and the time and manner in which the matter may be formally presented to foreign governments can only be determined after the fuller development of inquiries already initiated."

The victory for the Borah amendment paved the way in the House for the prompt passage of the Naval bill, which in its final form carries a total of $403,000,000. Further delay on the bill would have embarrassed the Navy Department, as it would have found itself without funds after July 1.

Congress Adopts Peace Resolution

SENATE and House conferees on the peace resolution have reached at last an agreement on a measure which embodies parts of both the original Knox and Porter drafts, and their report was adopted promptly by both Houses.

In the House the vote was 263 to 59, forty Democrats supporting it. In the Senate the vote was 38 to 19. President Harding was absent from the capital when the resolution was adopted, but there was little doubt regarding his approval.

The resolution as agreed to does not contain a repeal of the declarations of war against the Central Powers as did the Knox resolution, but merely declares the state of war at an end. It expressly reserves to the United States and its nationals any and all rights gained under the armistice or by participation in the war or stipulated for its benefit under the Versailles Treaty. All German and Austro-Hungarian property seized by the United States is to be retained, and no disposition shall be made of it except by specific legislation until those governments shall have made a satisfactory settlement of all American claims.

New Tariff Bill Introduced

THE Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee at last have finished their preparation of the tariff revision bill and the result of their labors—it was no small task, for the bill comprises 346 printed pages—has been introduced in the House.

The measure provides a general average of tariff duties estimated at 56 per cent., as against a general average of about 40 per cent. in the present law. The average of the Payne-Aldrich act of 1909, the last Republican tariff law, was 66 per cent., and in the main the new bill is built along the lines of that act, having regard to changed conditions of industries growing out of the war, as for example offering protection to dye and chrome making and certain metal activities.

The free list is much shorter than in the present law, and though some commodities have been added to it they are considerably fewer than the number transferred to the dutiable list. The authors of the bill paid heed, however, to the breakfast-table and the necessities of life, providing that coffee shall pay no duty and leaving coal on the free list.

One of the important sections of the new bill is that for the valuation of imported goods, made necessary by the uncertainty of exchange rates. The cost price of the imported article in foreign money will be compared at the customs house in this country with the value in American dollars, and the value will be determined on that basis.

Throughout the bill run provisions giving to the President the right to impose retaliatory duties on a country which imposes higher duties than the United States imposes on like products. There also are provisions for "bartering tariffs" which will enable Willis-Campbell bill through the Senate, but even if there should be delay there the prescribing of beer will be held up, as the new Federal Prohibition Commissioner is deferring the issuance of regulations until Congress has expressed its wishes in the matter.

Irish Peace Efforts Renewed

A DIRECT invitation from Premier Lloyd George to Eamonn de Valera, who is known as the president of the Irish Republic, to come to London with any colleague he might select to attend a conference with the British Government and Sir James Craig, the Ulster Premier, "to explore to the utmost the possibility of a settlement" has initiated a new effort to bring peace in Ireland. Mr. de Valera indicated his rejection of the invitation, but negotiations were continued and there was hope that progress would be made toward an agreement.

Mr. de Valera's preliminary reply expressed a desire to bring about a lasting peace between the peoples of the two islands, but declared he could "see no avenue by which it can be reached if you deny Ireland's essential unity and set aside the principle of national self-determination." Before making a definite reply he sought a conference with representatives of the opposing faction and asked Sir James Craig and four other Ulster leaders to meet him at Mansion House, Dublin. The Ulster Premier declined to go to Dublin on the ground that he already had accepted Premier Lloyd George's invitation to the London conference, but others of the Ulster leaders accepted Mr. de Valera's invitation, and it was expected the conference would take place.

In answering the Ulster Premier's telegram, Mr. de Valera indicated his rejection of Premier Lloyd George's invitation. "Mr. Lloyd George's proposal, because of its implications, is impossible of acceptance in its present form," he said. "Irish political differences should be adjusted and can, I believe, on Irish soil. But it is obvious that in negotiating peace with Great Britain the Irish delegation ought not to be divided, but should act as a unit on some common principle."

There was a strong sentiment in southern Ireland in favor of accepting the Lloyd George invitation without attaching impossible conditions, but neither in England nor Ireland was there undue optimism regarding the outcome of the parleys.

Greece Rejects Allied Offer

THE government of Greece has declined the offer of Great Britain, France and Italy to mediate between Greece and the Turkish Nationalists, and the Greeks continued their preparations for a big offensive effort. Fear of the political effect in Greece of the calling off of the drive, which has been widely advertised, and a belief that an unconditional acceptance would be tantamount to abandonment of the Treaty of Sèvres, by which Greece profits greatly, caused the rejection of the offer.

The Greeks tried their fighting abilities at Ismid, on the Sea of Marmora, recapturing the town with the aid of their warships. Three days later, however, they evacuated the town, leaving the Turkish Nationalists a clear road to Constantinople. Occupation of Constantinople as his capital is one of Mustapha Kemal's ambitions, and it was suggested that the Greek evacuation might be calculated to involve the Allies in open hostilities with the Kemalists, as the burden of the defense of the city would fall on Allied troops. The Turkish Nationalist Envoy in Paris declared the capture of Constantinople was not one of his chief's immediate military aims, and it was considered unlikely Kemal would fall into such a trap.

Reports that Turks and Bolsheviks had planned a vast uprising in Constantinople caused much uneasiness, and British forces conducted raids in the city in which they seized quantities of arms and several scores of prisoners.

the President to adjust tariff rates in many instances with countries which give trade advantages to the United States.

Unofficial estimates by the authors of the bill were that it would yield as high as $700,000,000 a year, whereas the Payne-Aldrich act in normal pre-war years produced a little more than $300,000,000 a year.

House Passes Anti-Beer Bill

THE Willis-Campbell anti-beer bill, which prevents physicians from prescribing beer for their patients and limits to one pint the amount of alcoholic liquor which may be prescribed for internal use in any ten-day period, has been passed by the House by a vote of 250 to 93. There never was any doubt during the four hours of debate as to what the result would be, but foes of the measure—who numbered 64 Republicans, 28 Democrats and 1 Socialist—took the chance to indulge in bitter attacks on prohibition legislation and drew heated replies from the drys.

The bill as passed embodies part of the supplemental Volstead bill, sections having been lifted out bodily after the House Rules Committee refused to sanction the Volstead bill as it stood. Chairman Campbell of the Rules Committee explained that the supplemental Volstead bill had been held up because it involved several controversial questions, such as the use of industrial alcohol, "over which the Congress has no control under the Eighteenth Amendment." The House felt the need for prompt action on the section banning beer as medicine because of the ruling by A. Mitchell Palmer, when he was Attorney General, that beer might be prescribed in unlimited quantities, a ruling which the drys feared would flood the country with beer.

The Younger Boy Problem Again

IN TALKING over these rather intimate problems of my family life, I hope no one who may happen to be reading the account will think that I am reciting the egotistic settling of difficult questions in the home once and for all. I am not trying so much to boast of how a Mere Man "solved" problems, as to tell you how he met them. It is one thing to meet or entertain a problem and another to actually solve it.

Take, for example, the trouble the older Boy is having over the evidence for and against the different propositions made to him by his professor and his minister. That problem is in the process of being solved. I think I really helped the Boy along the right track. But he is still wrestling over his philosophy and his theology, and he will have to work it out himself if the answer is going to become a part of his own convictions.

In the same way, the younger boy, John, is wrestling with his temptations over the movies, and having some struggle to keep the promise he made his mother not to go without asking her consent, or telling her that he was going. The habit of deception, we hoped, had disappeared, for which we were very thankful. But we can see that he is still restless when night comes and he wants to go somewhere. Two or three times my wife and I have gone to a picture show with him, when it looked from the advertisements that the film was fairly decent. But two out of the three films were so silly and even vulgar that we could hardly sit through the hour and a half. The boy confessed, himself, after we reached home that the pictures were "no account," and perhaps that statement reconciled his mother to the suffering she endured in looking at them.

But the spring days were coming on and John was getting more and more interested in outdoor sports, as I think I told you he was athletically inclined and was a tennis player and a member of the High School basketball team. His mother used to express some fear of his getting hurt at basket ball, but I remembered what she said to me about going out with the boy to his tennis, and one afternoon I closed down my desk early and went out to the High School ball-ground to see the boy in a match tennis game with some players from the Freshman class in the older boy's college.

THE game was a close one and as I watched it I grew more and more interested as I recalled my own college days and the fact that I used to be a pretty good player myself, and in fact I had carried off the university championship one year. But I had had a horror of the man who was always harking back to his achievements in college, and so I had seldom mentioned my athletic feats, and indeed I doubt if either my wife or the children had ever heard me mention the old university triumphs except perhaps when I may have somewhat incidentally spoken of some big event like an intercollegiate track meet and compared my own college ways with the modern ones.

But as I sat there that afternoon watching the young fellows make their strokes, an idea came to me that may seem to you somewhat fantastic, and perhaps impossible, but I will leave it to you to say what you like, after I relate how the thing came out.

John was playing a good game, but his opponent was too strong for him, and the games ended 6-2, 5-7, 6-4 in favor of the other boy. The two players came up to the net and shook hands in the regular fashion, but as I walked home with John I could not help noticing that he took his defeat rather hard, and he seemed specially anxious over a series of games in which he was listed to play during the school commencement week where the honor of winning was considered very great, and I could see that he was afraid he might disappoint the school, which was reckoning on his playing as the best player out of a larger number who had tried out for position.

I did not say much to him, only to compliment him on the fine rally he had made in the deuce set, as I was thinking over the plan I had in mind, but I noticed all through the evening meal that the boy felt sore over the defeat of the afternoon, and he was not at all sociable and chatty as his general habit is.

NOW I do not call myself an old man, even if I am married and the father of three pretty well grown up children. I am only fifty-two, and if I do say it, I have taken very good care of my body, going on the principle that it is the only one I have and needs to be well looked after. I am a member of a golf club, and also of the volley ball team of business men at the Y. M. C. A. gym, and I have kept up my practice of vigorous exercises regularly, and don't feel at all like taking a back seat, not even to the so-called young crowd.

By A MERIE MAN

The weather was getting fine for golf, so I planned every afternoon when the business would permit, to go to the grounds. But the day after the boy met his defeat at tennis, instead of playing golf out at the club, I went on the tennis courts. We have a number of courts at the club, and they are kept in fine condition. A few of the club members are tennis fans, and play that game mostly instead of golf. So I had no difficulty in getting up a match with one of the best players among the older young men. The first day he beat me in a close contest. But I challenged him to another, and beat him.

Gradually as the days went by and I grew accustomed to the stroke, I managed to get back some of my old-time form, and one after another I beat the club players. Sometimes we would have quite an audience to see the play. And for two weeks I kept up the practice, training for wind and certainty and using the old strokes that I had found effective, although I had to confess that some of the younger men had a knack of twisting the ball over in an awkward back spin that I could not return, until near the end of the second week I learned to take them on the volley close up to the net, instead of playing back, as my habit had been.

IT WAS one day after I had been playing continuously for over two weeks that I said to John just as he was starting off to school: "By the way, son, how are you coming on with the tennis? The commencement match comes off before long, doesn't it?"

He colored up and said somewhat doubtfully:

"I don't get the practice I need. The courts are filled every evening when I come out, and I have to wait my turn. My classes are not at the right time."

"How would you like to practice out at the golf club courts?"

He looked surprised.

"I'm not a member."

"No, but I am, and I can take you over as a guest."

He brightened up at that, because he knew from report what fine grounds we had.

"But who will play with me?"

"I will."

He laughed. "What practice will I get with you? I need to play with a better player than I am in order to get any good out of it."

I didn't say anything, much, only to tell him that I would give him as good a game as I knew how. He seemed pleased at the opportunity to go out, and the next day we went together and found one of the best courts unoccupied.

I thought it only fair to say to him after we had tossed up for position and service, that I used to play a pretty good game in college. I noticed the rather skeptical grin on the boy's face as I said it, and I went back to the base line to serve, as I had won the toss and chosen service, leaving him the advantage of the sun and the wind.

I THOUGHT I might as well begin on him at my best, so I served him a twister that hit the ground in the extreme right-hand corner of his court, and went off at a sharp angle with almost no bound at all. It was so baffling to him that I won the game, 40-love.

I shall never forget the look on the boy's face as he picked up the balls and went back to his corner to serve to me. It was such a mingling of respect and astonishment that I wanted to laugh, but was afraid it would hurt his feelings, so I looked very grave as I returned his first ball with a Lawford spin that just grazed the top of the net and hit the ground almost on the back line.

I won't try to describe the set we played, but it is enough to say that the score was 6-3 in my favor. As we changed sides of the net, John said, "I didn't know I was playing with a professional." He looked very queer and I could see that a new feeling towards his father had come to him inside of the time it took to play that first set.

He beat me the second set, 6-4. But the next was a deuce set. I thought it might almost break his heart to lose it, but on the other hand I had an end in view, and I finished up the game by calling into use a stroke of back-handed downward volley that I had learned from Larned. He could not possibly return it, and the game and set went to me, 7-5.

On the way home John said very little. But at the supper table he let himself out to the family in praise of his Dad. If I had been elected President I doubt if the lad could have had more respect for me. He was a hero worshipper, and the idea that I had beat him on his own boasted ground of athletics appealed to his boyish imagination. I found that I had a place in his respect that he had never paid me before, and it gave me an influence with him that I found I needed as other events came on.

IT WAS a few Sundays after that game that my wife came home from church with a troubled look that made me ask her what caused it. I had not been to church that Sunday for some reason, too tired, or too much Sunday paper, I think. But the minute my wife came in I saw that she was very much disturbed.

"Mrs. Thompson" (she is our next-door neighbor) "came to me after church and said her boy and our John spent the Sunday-school hour in the drug-store this morning. He is in the down-stairs room, you know, and my class meets in the church, so I did not know John was not in his class. Oh, I feel so bad about it! He is deceiving us again!"

The drug-store in our neighborhood is the common meeting place of the "gang," and I knew at once what my wife felt as she thought of the boy spending the Sunday-school hour there.

"Was he at church?" I asked, my anger rising.

"Oh, yes. He sat with me as always."

That is why I supposed he had been in his Sunday-school class."

"Where is he now?"

"He is coming along. He came out of church with some of the boys and was behind me."

"He can't go on this way!" I said, sternly. "He promised not to deceive us in the matter of the movies, and now he is doing it in the matter of his Sunday school. It must be stopped!"

"You have great influence with him. Oh, use it wisely, won't you? I am praying for him. But you can use your influence with him at a critical time. Be wise, won't you!"

I promised my wife that I would, but I confess I felt a good deal upset by the boy's conduct. The "gang" at the drug-store is made up of the neighborhood boys, some of whom have had rather doubtful reputations, and it hurt me to think that one of our boys was associating with them, especially on Sunday when he was supposed to be in his Sunday school.

In a few minutes the boy came in. His mother had gone out into the kitchen to get dinner.

"Come up to the den," I said shortly.

He knew in a minute what the trouble was. But there was a look of sullen opposition on his face that I did not like, as he sat there in the den facing me. It was a very important conference which we held and it had very important bearing on several lives. It was so important that I shall have to ask you to wait until the next chapter to tell you how it came out. Meanwhile, I hope you will not forget the boy's mother is praying.

How to Enjoy the Worship

By DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

1. Please do not stand in the aisles and visit while the ushers are seating the people.
2. Enter the church reverently, praying for a blessing as you come in.
3. Have a part in the service of giving. If the church is worth a dollar to you, don't express it with a nickel in the basket.
4. Sing with heart and voice. And don't look as if you had lost your best friend as you say "Amen."
5. Please do not talk or whisper during the service. Remember others.
6. Mothers who bring little children to church ought to be able to find some good place for them provided by the church committee.
7. Pray that the result of the service today may be the salvation of sinners.
8. Make it a joyful service. We are not burying any one.
9. Help the preacher by thinking, if he says anything worth while.
10. Carry the spirit of the service home with you and discuss the good of it across the table for the help of yourselves and your family.

Right and Wrong Living

A Sermon by REV. E. B. DAVIDSON *

TEXT—1 Sam. 31: 1. "And Samuel died, and all Israelites were gathered together and lamented him." II Chron. 35: 26. "He [Jehoram] reigned in Jerusalem eight years, and departed without being desired, howbeit they buried him in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings."

WITH a very lofty disdain, the most of us are wont to say that we do not care what folks remark concerning us after we are dead. "A living dog is better than a dead lion," seems to be our creed. "Give us the flowers now," we cry. Amen! but is there anything wrong about having them both in life and in death? If we are only to have them once, then let us have them while we can see and smell. When we are told that "It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting," I presume we are supposed to interpret it as meaning that it is better for us who go. Yet, our very presence there may be complimentary to the corpse.

More people have journeyed to the tombs of Washington, Lincoln, Grant and Roosevelt than ever visited them in life. Standing before the memorial erected to the memory of Sam Davis of Tennessee in the grounds of the State House at Nashville, I took off my hat, not in tribute to his rebellion, but to his courage and his loyal friendship. He died rather than betray a friend. But not many pilgrimages are made to the tomb of Aaron Burr or Benedict Arnold. On another occasion I stood by the tomb of Burr, but not uncovered. To neither Sam Davis nor Aaron Burr could I give the flowers while they lived. At their tombs I had the opportunity to pay a silent tribute. To the one I did, to the other I did not.

It seems to be a part of our human nature to think and speak more kindly about people after they are dead, than we did while they were alive. We "give them the benefit of the doubt" then. We speak softly, we tread lightly in the house of mourning. If men have no kind word for us, no charitable thought when they stand by our "remains," wicked, indeed, must have been our life. If what is said about a man after his demise is a correct statement of his influence upon his fellows, it makes a great difference what they say, because their words will be an indication of the value or worthlessness of his life.

SAMUEL and Jehoram both seem to have had the advantages of good ancestry. The former was the son of Elkanah and Hannah. The Bible does not tell us a great deal about those parents. It is unique in that it does not say much about the most of its characters, but what it says is sufficient to give us an insight into their real personality. "Enech walked with God, and he was not, for God took him." Rather a brief biography yet it is large enough to tell us what kind of a man he was. Many centuries afterward, with full confidence, and with nothing other to guide him save this simple statement, the writer of a New Testament epistle could say that Enech "before his death had this testimony, that he pleased God." The biographer or the novelist would have used many pages, and then not have stated it so well.

So, while we do not have a protracted inlook upon the lives of Samuel's parents, we can see enough to wish that every boy had such parentage as he. What better mother than Hannah has any boy had? What a model for all women, especially mothers, to follow! And the father was one of those men who did not send his boy to church—he took him. It isn't strange that God could find a tremendous task for a boy from such a home. Nor that he could easily be brought to say, "Speak, for thy servant heareth."

Jehoram likewise sprang from a good ancestry. His father was Jehoshaphat, his grandfather, on the paternal side, Asa. Asa reigned for forty-one years, greatly loved and honored by his people. He was zealous in the overthrow of heathenism, sparing not even his own grandmother Maachab, burning the symbol of her idolatrous religion and throwing its ashes into the Kidron. So upright was his life that the chronicler has written into the imperishable record "the heart of Asa was perfect all his days." Jehoshaphat followed in the footsteps of his father. During his reign of twenty-five years he was always an eager follower of the commandments of the Lord. He tried, but not always with success, to destroy the high places and groves in which the people of Judah burnt incense to idols. Of him the chronicler has written: "His heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord."

There was another particular in which these men stood upon a basis of equality. Both had been entrusted with positions of honor and responsibility. To have such is to be challenged to greatness, both in material and spiritual attainment. It mattered little that Samuel was a prophet and a judge, and Jehoram was the fifth king of Judah. A man has just as big a chance to serve God and his fellows on the throne as in the pulpit or on the bench. Holiness is not the exclusive property of the priesthood. There is no respect of persons shown by God. I think it is equally true that there is no respect of place shown by Him.

So I do not find any material difference in the outside environment of these men. The difference was on the inside. That is where all real differences are found. Outer circumstances may change us, but the change is registered in our characters. Living in the slums may give one hardened features, but it is because the heart has first been hardened. Sin is the personification of ugliness. It is not merely accidental that the devil is represented as being like a serpent or a dragon, while the Christ is pictured as "the One altogether lovely."

It is not difficult to see that Samuel and Jehoram assumed different attitudes toward life and its responsibilities. Samuel took life seriously, Jehoram flippancy. It makes a vast difference whether or not we live in a vain effort to glorify himself. When the people forgot God, when they cried out for a king "who should go before them," the heart of Samuel was heavy. He might have rejoiced instead, and begun to "pull the wires" to have himself elevated to that position. And when the chosen king made shipwreck of his life and his kingship, in place of rejoicing, Samuel "cried unto the Lord all night." But Jehoram, departing from the worship of the true God, instituted the worship of Baal. Nor was any good effect produced upon him by a prophetic message sent to him from the prophet Isaiah. It makes all the difference in the world as to whom a man seeks to glorify. The promises of God are to him who abases himself.

Again, Samuel sought to serve his generation and his people well. Jehoram sought to rule by murder and oppression. Indeed it seems that Samuel was always thinking of the welfare of his fellows. He warned them of the probable results that would follow the coronation of a king, but he did not forsake them when those results began to be realized. And even after he "came no more to see Saul . . . nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul." On the other hand, no sooner had Jehoram ascended his throne than "he strengthened himself, and slew all his brethren with the sword, and divers also of the princes of Israel."

In the slaying of his six brothers he was able to seize the silver and gold, the precious things, and the fenced cities in Judah, which they had inherited from their father. He "caused the inhabitants of Jerusalem to commit fornication, and compelled Judah thereto." It is not strange, therefore, that in the day of death, the opinions of men should be widely different as between Samuel and Jehoram.

WE HAVE seen no noticeable difference in the sunrise of these men's lives, but how different the sunset of each! "Full of days," Samuel passed peacefully into eternity. Harsh experiences, weary days, troublous nights, bitter tears had been his lot. But, at the end, all was peace. He could look back across the years and see a life well spent in the service of God and man. No vain regrets over the course he had pursued. "There remaineth a rest to the people of God"; and Samuel found that rest.

When but forty years of age, Jehoram departed, and his young was anything but peaceful. He, too, had had harsh experiences; weary days, troublous nights, perhaps even bitter tears, if such as he could be capable of shedding them, but they were self-inflicted. The Edomites revolted from under the hand of Judah in his day, and made themselves a king; Libnah also revolted; the Lord stirred up against him the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabians, who, coming up into Judah, entered the king's house and took away all his substance, his wives, and all his sons, save one. Then the Lord smote him with an incurable disease, and after two years of horrible suffering he died. No peace in life; none in death!

I am not seeking to teach what would not be true, that every good man is guaranteed a painless death and every bad man a painful one. But I am firmly convinced that the man who has lived as Samuel lived will meet his earthly end in a far different manner than the man who has lived as Jehoram lived.

There are men who depart "unwept, unhonored and unsung." Wives are happier, children more blithful, when they are gone. There are children who so live that when they go, if we could really understand their parents' tears, we should know they were shed not so much in sorrow at their going, as in sorrow over the wicked, wasted lives they lived. There is a world of significant meaning in the wet eye or the dry eye when one is no more. It really matters how men will act when we are gone.

With deepest reverence, Samuel was buried in his own house at Ramoth, in dishonor Jehoram was buried "in the city of David, but not in the sepulchre of the kings." "And his people made no burning for him, like the burning of his fathers." What advantage in being a king in life if one cannot be a king in death? "What shall it profit a man though he gain the whole world, if he lose himself?"

Oh, the tragedy of living in such a way that men will be glad when we are gone! Oh, the heaven of so living that when we go "those that look out of the windows shall be darkened . . . and the mourners shall go about the streets!" What flowers may be brought, what monuments erected, what epitaphs written thereon, we shall not know; but God help us all to so live, that, being dead, we shall yet speak; and when men come to carry us to our "long home," they shall be "devout men," who shall not think us unworthy to rest beside the holiest and who shall feel it a sacred duty to keep ever green our memories!

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken," or "My Hope Is Built on Nothing Less."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 103, read verses 1 to 13. God's Love and Providence.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(See page 504, first column).

Sermon—"RIGHT AND WRONG LIVING!" To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Just as I am, Without One Plea" or "There Is a Fountain Filled with Blood."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Infinite but tender-hearted, powerful but forgiving, eternal but close to us who live in time, gracious in mercy, compassionate in the contemplation of our need, we ask as children from a great Father to make our meeting full of comfort to our hearts and nourishment to our souls, in the name of our Redeemer who walked and talked and worked with men on earth. In His Name we ask forgiveness, acceptance and blessing. AMEN.

think that "Life is real; life is earnest." We have been so cautioned against "wearing a long face" that we think it is a mark of moral superiority to "wear a broad one." I am not pleading for a return to the former, but I am pleading that we should consider life as being something other than a joke, and death something other than "the great adventure." It is the grace of God, Paul said, that teaches us that, "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Mind you, it is the "graciousness" of God that so teaches us.

THERE was a difference in the affections of these men. Samuel "hitched his wagon to a star"; Jehoram hitched his to the dunghill. We speak of "ideals" as though the holding to such made us kingly. We must remember that one's "ideals" may make him a fool. There was a vast difference between the Paul who gave his life in defense of the Christ and the Paul who persecuted those of "the way" unto the death. Yet in both cases he had the same end in view—the glorification of God.

"A man's reach should exceed his grasp," said Robert Browning. I think it usually does. But some of the things for which men reach are not worthy of being grasped. I like John Ruskin's statement: "He only is advancing in life, whose heart is getting softer, whose blood warmer, whose brain quicker, whose spirit is entering into Living peace. And the men who have this life in them are the true lords or kings of the earth—they, and they only." And Jehoram was not one of them, even though he sat upon a throne!

Samuel used his life to glorify God; Jehoram used

The Great Resting-Place of Faith

SUNDAY. I Peter 1:8. "On whom . . . believing."—The figure is suggestive of a leaning posture, an attitude of dependence, a confident resting of one's weight upon the Christ we love. It is the acceptance of His reasonings as sound. It is the assumption that His judgments are dependable. It is the usage of His weapons as adequate for our strife. It is the assurance that His promises are the expression of spiritual laws, and that there is no more caprice in their ministry than there is in the operation of laws in the physical world. "On Him believing."

But it is more than assent to a conclusion, more than a confidence in His word. It is repose upon a person, a resting upon a presence, a trusting in a companionship. If the Christian evangel is worth anything at all, it means this—that the Christ of God, the "Lover of the soul," is by the loved one's side in inseparable and all-sufficient fellowship. In the moment of extraordinary crisis and strain, "on" Him I can depend for immediate equipment. In the long-drawn-out day of wearying and monotonous commonplace, "on" Him I can lean for unfailing supplies. In the dark and cloudy day, and amid the gathering terrors of the advancing night, "on" Him I can depend for inspiring light and life.

That is the very music of the Christian evangel. The words which indicate the Master's presence suggest the all-significant closeness of His spirit. "Companion"! "Comforter"! "Fellowship"! "Partaker"! The phraseology varies; the significance is one. The Lord is imminent and immediate: "Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet"; upon Him we may trustfully rest our weight in all the changing circumstances of our ever-changing way.

"On whom . . . believing, ye rejoice." Is there anything surprising in the issue? Won by His love, wedded to the Lord, confident in His fellowship—is it any wonder that out of such wealthy conditions there should arise a fountain of joy? Surely we have the very ingredients of spiritual delight. If we take spiritual affection—"whom, not having seen, ye love"—and combine it with spiritual confidence—"on whom . . . believing"—I do not see how we can escape the crown of rejoicing. If either of the elements be annihilated, our joy is destroyed.

All the bird-music that rings through the countryside at the dawn can be hushed by the appearance of the hawk. Let your little child come into a presence in whom she has not gained confidence, and the light of joy departs, and her face becomes like a blown-out lamp.

It is the co-operative ministry of love and confidence which awakes the genius joy. It is the love and confidence of wedded life which make the clear, calm joy of the hurrying years. The thought of the loved one is a baptism of light. A letter from the loved one redeems any day from commonplace. The presence of the loved one is a full and perpetual feast.

It is not otherwise in the highest relationships. If the soul and the Lord are lovers, and there is a mutual confidence, the soul will drink at the river for rare and exquisite delights. J. H. J.

The Far-Reaching Love of God

MONDAY. Luke 15:20. "When He was yet a great way off."—No man can wander away so far as to lose his place in the Father's heart. However fallen he may be, nevertheless God loves him. A woman may so defile the garments of her womanhood that other and more respectable sinners look askance at her; but God still loves her. His love is the most persistent, never-failing, indestructible thing in the universe.

You may keep on sinning as long as you live, die impenitent and go into outer darkness; but even there His love will follow you. I do not say that it will save you; for in the covenant of salvation there is a "party of the second part," without whose consent all overtures of mercy are ineffectual; but I do say that there never yet was a man created in God's likeness who sinned so far or so utterly expatriated himself that the love of the Father shall not forever and forever follow him.

Alas, if it prove to be an unavailing love!

Making a Radiant World

TUESDAY. John 8:12. "I am the Light of the world."—Looking unto Jesus, we become radiant with His glory. As radium gives out light, heat and healing without diminution of its powers, so we may shine for Christ. The hearts of all believers may become radioactive, giving out infinite energy. Nations, like individuals, should reflect the light of Liberty enlightening the world. Is not the cry, "America for Americans," unlike the Gospel idea of service for all mankind?

He that saveth his life shall lose it, for there is that which withholdeth and it tendeth to poverty. Accumulation for benevolence is Godlike.

Radium shines without being consumed or replenished, except as God's energy causes it to flame like the burning bush. If we let our light shine, the supply will be undiminished, but when hidden under the bushel of self, it becomes extinguished.

No scientist can explain radium or electricity any more than he can explain God. If we accept radium, the telegraph and telephone, why not accept the Author? His higher spiritual energy waits to charge your being with all power, so you may shine as the stars forever.

Radium churches are making a radiant world; they obey the divine command, "Go ye into all the world; shine for Me, do My will," while an increasing halo of spiritual light will encircle you.

The nation that seeks to light the pathway of darkened peoples, endeavoring to illuminate all mankind with the light of life, will never cease its shining, as did Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre and Rome. Such a republic will become the central light of all nations when Jesus comes to possess the kingdom of this world.

Radium rays prolong or destroy life, according to our attitude towards them. Is it not so with the diviner light? It may become a consuming fire or an effulgent glory, according to our reception or rejection of His power. He is able to make all things work together for our good. The choice is ours. E. W. C.

The Divine Type of Manhood

WEDNESDAY. John 19:5. "And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man!" It requires no deep knowledge of what lies beneath the surface of current history to perceive that the quality of Christ's manhood is one of the things the world stands most in need of in our day. What are the characteristics of this age? Are they not: loss of faith in humanity; loss of faith in idealism; loss of faith in God; a passion for self-seeking? Did ever the world more need high-toned, high-minded, high-motived souls?

We have enough politicians who build "high places" for the worship of mere policy. We have enough captains of industry who have built us a huge Babel which threatens to topple with its own weight. We have enough preachers of peace when there is no peace.

Now we need more prophets, men who see that "the highest of all politics is the politics of the soul"; more statesmen who will guide their course and help to guide the nation's course by the stars; more students of large maps, who see beyond the level of the fields they occupy.

The model? "Behold the Man." He was not afraid to build His kingdom on love; to appeal to the conscience as His inward ally; to sacrifice present ease for future empire. And there is room for us in His school.

The simplest definition of a Christian is a disciple. We must study His words. We must seek to possess His spirit. We must imitate His methods. We must invoke and secure His presence in blessing, and His gifts in courage and truth. C. C. A.

The Value of Convictions

THURSDAY. II Timothy. 1:12. "I know Him whom I have believed." At a recent meeting of a Boy Scout Troop, the following conversation was heard:

Tenderfoot Scout—"May I take my second-class test?"

Scoutmaster—"Are you ready to take your test?"

Tenderfoot Scout—"I guess so."

Scoutmaster—"I am not at all interested in your guesses or what you only think you know. If you cannot give a clear-cut statement without a guess or a perhaps or an 'I think so,' I do not care to listen. When you enter the business or professional world and face the issues and crises of your daily work, only unqualified convictions will serve you; but if you intend to guess your way along you will be a failure. Are you ready for your test?"

The test was not taken that night.

Convictions are needed. Especially is this true in the realm of the religious. There is nothing so heartening to a hungry and searching individual as to listen to a person who is absolutely sure of whatever promises he may make in the nature of spiritual enlightenment or religious instruction. Paul speaks the language of certainty. Every sentence strikes twelve. Every word is pure gold, with the true ring and without the slightest trace of alloy. "I know whom I have believed" rings like a trumpet note through all his preaching.

There are some questions concerning which we cannot afford to be otherwise than confident and assured. Truth wrought out on the anvil of experience is something that we need, and which we embrace gladly in these times of uncertain trumpets and divers gospels ringing on every hand.

The Bible is full of clear-cut statements and clarion-like declarations and crystal-clear dictums. "We know that we are of God." "We know that we are of the truth." "We know that we dwell in Him." "I know whom I have chosen." "We are confident." "We are always confident."

As an interesting study and profitable experiment let the reader examine the pages of the Bible with the theme in mind. On almost every page he will find the positive note. "I know that my Redeemer liveth" is the heart of the Gospel, the keynote of Christian progress, the epitome of righteous endeavor, the logic of missionary conquest, and the motive-power for an intelligent and consistent civilization. It makes for an out-and-out Christian, while "I think that my Redeemer liveth" and "I hope this is true," makes for an in-and-out sort of a Christian life that, in the last analysis, spells little by way of genuine accomplishment and worth-while achievement. Hesitation, groping, vacillation, wavering, make no conquest and capture no territory in any realm of human thought and endeavor. R. B.

Soul Beauty

FRIDAY. II Chron. 20:21. The beauty of holiness.—In one of our daily papers there is a Department called "The Art of Beauty," where women are advised how to beautify themselves with rouges, cosmetics and the like. This opens up a sidelight into one sort of self-culture, but not such as makes for Character or the adorning of the soul.

One of the most beautiful women I know lives in a cramped apartment up in Harlem where she takes care of an invalid husband and three children. Time was when she shone brilliantly in social life. One of her former friends said to me recently, "How she has gone off!" "What do you mean?" "Lost her looks!" She has, indeed. The manicure and milliner are nothing to her nowadays. But the time is coming when her children will rise up and call her blessed, and when the crowsfeet and wrinkles and other curves of mother-love that have spoiled her "looks" will seem to them as curves of perfect beauty.

This is that favor which is not deceitful, and this is that beauty which is not vain. "Give her of the fruit of her hands and let her works praise her in the gates!" D. J. B.

The Fadeless Crown

SATURDAY. Rev. 2:10. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee the crown of life." A crown of flowers is flowers, a crown of laurel, laurel, a crown of gold is gold. The crown of life is life at its best. It is the flower, the laurel and the gold of life. And the flower does not fade, the laurel is everlasting, the gold imperishable. Of course, there are other crowns. There are crowns of fading flowers, of lifeless laurel, of fool's gold. There are crowns of the day and hour that are not to be despised if they have been honestly won. For instance, there are athletic crowns, literary crowns, commercial crowns, political crowns and innumerable other crowns; but they are comparatively of trifling concern. There is nothing of the lastingness of life about them. They are characterized as "corruptible," and they do not last forever.

The gift of life is the outstanding and all-inclusive characteristic of the Christian Gospel. It is the life that is rooted and grounded in the eternities of the Almighty and the everlastingness of the Lord. Conversion, which is the glad surrender of the soul to God for development and training, that we may be "perfect and wanting nothing," brings another world into view, making the intuitions and intimations of immortality certain. Intellectual ideas and ideals, are intensified and heightened; manhood and womanhood are mightily invigorated, the conscience is vivified, the will strengthened, the soul is enriched and sustained by something better than ambrosia, feeding upon the living bread and waters of eternal life. In other words, the soul is wedded to Jesus Christ and shares by faith the adventure of his destiny. That is character's crown. It is for that we were born and for that we live.

And the capacity for this conversion and expansion and enrichment and completion belongs to us all. "Let no man take thy crown." Strive for it. Pray for it. Guard it earnestly. Here and everywhere, it is the only thing worth striving for, because it is the only thing that lasts in a universe of change and decay. R. B.

A Call on Madame Curie

SO SMALL, Small, Timid, Infinitely Tired, and slim, and colorless, she seemed—so unassuming, and timid, and above all, so infinitely tired—that I had to remind myself, over and over, that she was a personage of international importance. As I heard her voice, answering questions with an almost monotonous lack of expression, I had to say—more than once—in my mind:

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"This woman is Madame Curie—MADAME MARIE CURIE! This woman is the co-discoverer of radium. She is one of the greatest scientists of our day, she has been honored by universities, and presidents, and kings. She has done much to benefit mankind—she is working, now, on a marvelous cure for cancer. This woman is a wonderful woman—she is Madame Curie!"

Mme. Curie—the name carries with it a real thrill! It suggests sheer romance—the romance of discovery, of earth problems, of hidden treasure. And it suggests even more—it stands for extreme bravery and abounding patience!

THE world knows the story of Mme. Curie—knows it so well that I need only give a brief outline here of the barest facts. The world knows how she came, a pretty little Polish girl, to study science in a French college. And the world knows how the young Professor Curie fell in love with her and married her.

Few marriages are so successful—and so happy—as was their union. They had a great love, you see, and they had also a common passion for the same sort of work. Side by side they toiled, in complete understanding and sympathy, until they made the discovery that has revolutionized certain chemical and medical ideas.

Yes, they lived, and loved, and worked together until their companionship—their partnership—was brought to an untimely end by the death of the Professor—under the wheels of a cart, carelessly driven through the crowded streets of Paris. And Mme. Curie was left with two young daughters to bring up—and a great work, all unfinished, to accomplish!

Many women would have faltered under the magnitude of such a task. But Mme. Curie did not allow her broken heart to interfere with the problem that she and her husband had been so eager to solve. By great privation and struggle—knowing poverty and illness and, recently, lack of the very material to work with—she forged ahead. One can scarcely wonder that her shoulders are stooped, now—that her eyes are tired, and that her step is slow!

A few months ago Mme. Curie was summoned to America. She had never before been in our country and she came gladly. She did not know, then, that she had been invited to visit us that she might receive—as the gift of the women of America—a gram of radium (that extremely rare mineral) and a small amount of mesothorium (another costly metal closely allied to radium.) The gift is valued at $165,000!

I SAW Mme. Curie the day before she sailed back to France. Patiently, her worn hands folded in her lap, she sat before a group of representatives of the press, and gave her thoughts on the subject of America. Slowly, with a hesitation that was more from fatigue than unfamiliarity with the English language, she spoke:

"When I get back—to France—" she said, "I will first of all . . . rest!" She sighed, and then— "But do not think that I have not appreciate the honor—and the pleasure—that you of America give to me! And the great gift of your women—it will enable me to go on with my research . . ." her voice shook slightly—it was the only trace of emotion that she displayed during the whole of the interview!

Somebody asked her what had most impressed her during her visit to America. Her answer, when it came, was surprising.

"Your Grand Canyon—" she said unhesitatingly. "Your Grand Canyon, and the public playgrounds that you have placed in all of your cities!" She paused, for a moment, and then:

"I have go so rapidly through your great country," she said, "that I am bewildered. And of course those things that stand out most clearly in my mind are the ones that I have seen most thoroughly. Your colleges, your scientific laboratories, your hospitals have deeply impress me. Never have I been privileged to see such large and well-equipped seats of learning—such clinics! Never have I seen so many people in a hurry, so much real eagerness to learn. No— (in answer to a question) "I do not think that the people of the United States are too—how can you say it?—commercial. They are so glad to listen—and to give!"

"Your ceeties? Who can say which is the most beautiful—and the most wonderful! Your West is amazing—and so is New York. Washington, D. C.—it is a fitting place for your center of government to be situate'. And Philadelphia—that is like a bit of the old world. And—of course—" a faint smile played at the corners of her wan mouth, curiously softening the whole of her face, "of course Pittsburgh—for Pittsburgh has produce' more Radium than any other ceety in the world!"

THERE was a slight stir in the next room—a rustle of skirts. Glancing through the portières I caught a glimpse of a slim girl in a rose-pink jersey—a girl who fairly flamed with youth! She was pretty, that girl—so pretty! And yet as I looked swiftly from her glowing face to the face of the colorless little woman in the chair I was able, dimly, to see their kinship. It was quite evidently one of the two daughters. I could not help wondering if Mme. Curie had been so vivid, once—so untouched by the tragedy and toil of life!

The representatives of the press were leaving. And Mme. Curie rose, just a shade wearily, from her chair to acknowledge their good wishes and good-byes. Her hand felt fragile as it touched mine—fragile but not femininely soft. It was the hand of a worker.

"In the autumn," she said, wearily, "I shall go back to my laboratory—Yes? And then—who knows?"

SO SLIM, she seemed, and small and tired that it was hard to believe that she had received sixty-five honorary degrees from as many colleges—that during her stay in America ten of the degrees, as well as six money and medal awards, were given to her. It seemed hard to believe that she was the woman who has often sifted through a ton of raw material to find one grain of her precious discovery.

Indeed, as I felt her hand touch mine, as I looked fleetingly into her tired eyes, I had to say over and over—quite to myself:

"This is Mme. Curie—Mme. Marie Curie. This woman is the co-discoverer of radium!"

WHEN the leather-workers of Larpura, India, became Christians, they were not satisfied that the news should go out among the people slowly. They wanted everybody to know it at once. So they had the public drums beaten, and crier went through the streets shouting, "We, the Chamars of Larpura, are all become servants of the Lord."

"If a graduate of a medical school goes into practise in the United States, he will have to work for years to gain even a local reputation," says Dr. Arthur Kelly, one of the great American surgeons, "but if he goes into mission work, he will gain a reputation bounded only by the horizon, and will be a statesman as well as a doctor."

The playground of thousands of New York children

MONT-LAWN

OVER 60,000 little children of the tenements have passed through the gates of Mont-Lawn since that first summer morning, twenty-eight years ago, when the initial group arrived.

What a summer that was! There was a little wooden chapel, every beam in which had been drilled through and through by carpenter bees until the sawdust ran out at the slightest touch. Then there was an old farmhouse, clean and comfortable; a little entrance lodge so frail that it was blown down by the wind next winter; a stable, through the roof of which one could see the stars at night; a long antiquated Dutch house, whose panelled doors and shutters were made by some skilled workman before the days of woodworking by machinery. And there was a big tent, large enough to accommodate several hundred of the little folks at meals, and a brook, good, deep wells of wholesome water, wide-sweeping playgrounds with swings and merry-go-rounds, and hand-organ music for the children. Then there were acres upon acres of glorious woodlands, with flowers and birds and fruit in abundance.

Today Mont-Lawn is of a truth "The Children's Paradise" and by that name it is known everywhere, as it deserves to be. It has six large substantial dormitories; "The Homestead" or Superintendent's offices and headquarters. The only "Children's Temple" in the world is there, and in that beautiful building children of many nationalities and many creeds sing the same hymns and say the same simple, trustful prayers. The tent has long since been displaced by the big dining-hall, "Fort Plenty," in which 400 wee lads and lassies sit at meals. The dormitories are a group of the prettiest buildings imaginable, hygienic in the last degree. There are playgrounds for the little ones and also for the bigger boys and girls where they are taught by trained instructors, a swimming-pool, a wading-pool, ball-fields, etc., so that all ages may have the benefit of physical instruction. The bathing-house is an attractive feature and a daily delight.

Musical training always has been one of the charms of Mont-Lawn and the rendering of the hymns and patriotic songs by the fresh young voices is inexpressibly sweet.

Every child, and there are more than 3,000 there every summer, sleeps in a spotless cot in a cool, well-ventilated dormitory. The food is abundant and nourishing, and pale cheeks are soon transformed with the hue of health. Mont-Lawn has its own physician and nurses, its teachers, houseworkers and lawn-tenders. It is a place where health glows in every face and happiness fills every heart. The keynote is love and the children know and appreciate this. They are eager to come and loath to go when their ten days' visit is over. And often in the winter down in the city tenements may be heard the songs of Mont-Lawn sung by little ones who keep alive the memories of the happy days spent in the "Children's Paradise."

It is a fact worth noting here that not one child has ever died at Mont-Lawn in all the years since it was first opened, nor has anyone contracted serious sickness. God has prospered and blessed the place, and caused it to blossom like the rose for the children and in recognition of the thousands of Christian Herald readers who have built it up and developed it by their gifts and their prayers.

Saul Proclaims Jesus as the Christ

International Sunday School-Lesson for July 24

Acts 9:19b-30

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

A CHRISTIAN is safer when he is proclaiming his Christianity and living up to his profession than when seeking to be a secret believer. Dr. Charles R. Erdman in his very helpful commentary on Acts says "A secret believer is a hypocrite." Luke, in verse 20, states that Saul "straightway in the synagogue proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God." Just as soon as the eunuch believed, when Philip preached to him by the wayside, he desired to be baptized and the sacrament was administered forthwith. Saul began at once, and in the synagogue of the Jews, to declare his new birth and the fact that the Messiah, God's Son, had come.

Both at Damascus and three years later, at Jerusalem, we note the new convert had to prove the reality of his conversion as he sought fellowship with other Christians. Though the past is forgiven by God it is not forgotten by men. Right where the wrong was committed one can re-establish himself. It required real courage for Saul to be a preacher in the two cities just named. The Damascus audience's might question, but they soon became convinced that a new man with a new manner of life was in their midst. They beheld the new wine in a new wineskin.

In our studies concerning Saul, we must use the map constantly. Turn to your map and make a general study of it. There are numerous maps which have the journeys of this preacher to the Gentiles clearly marked. He made three great trips and then went to Rome. Do not depend on any map that you have. Begin by drawing an outline map of good size. Make it three feet by two. Use a sheet of cardboard or heavy paper. Fill in places as they are named in the lesson study each week. Use different colored pencils to trace the four journeys. If you prefer a map already made use colored worsteds to outline the journeys or place a large-headed pin where your hero is in each lesson. Move the pin as you travel with Saul. We will insert in the margin of our Bibles just where, in the Acts narrative, each epistle was written. Begin now by writing, in the margin of your Bible, at Acts 9:21, Gal. 1:16-17, for it was from Damascus that Paul went to Arabia and then returned to Damascus for further preaching, as is seen in Acts 9:22.

THE Intermediate and Senior topic is "Getting Ready for a New Career," and the passage in Galatians is particularly mentioned. Three years are spent by this new convert in finding himself, in preparation through study and in prayer (Gal. 1:18). Saul as a Jew knew the Old Testament from youth. Now he is restudying those books and finding Christ therein. The scales had fallen from his eyes in more respects than one. Saul was now permitting, and even seeking to have the Holy Spirit perform His office work and take of the things of Christ and reveal them unto him. The Desert College in Arabia has an apt pupil. He is studying not only for himself but that he may preach truth to multitudes and write epistles to great churches which he would establish. These epistles have become the text books for unnumbered millions as they have sought to know the Triune God.

It will be profitable to note others who also had personal schooling by God in actual Arabia, or in some desert place which became an "Arabia" for them. Moses, Elijah, John the Baptist, Christ and Paul had desert days prior to or in connection with their great life work. Time and seclusion are needed in which to think things through. We are told, Matthew 6:6, "But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut thy door, pray to thy Father." Some times we must find some "Arabia" that we may be sufficiently removed from man and his doings to accomplish the real task of shutting the door and of being shut in with God, so we can really talk with Him and then remain long enough in His presence to obtain His reply. Have you a prayer place where you especially go for your communion with God? The fact is fully recognized that God is everywhere and we can talk to him in any place and at any time and still each one of us must have our SHUT-IN place.

The great theologian of the New Testament, having completed his three years of study into the deep things of God, comes forth with a statement of truth which has become of incalculable value to the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is far more difficult to think out a creedal statement than to accept the same when it commends itself to us. Saul, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, thought out the position which lesser theologians have been declaring ever since. Look up the proof texts for most of the doctrines and you will find that Paul is quoted more frequently than any other writer.

It is this great preacher, scholar and defender of the faith who goes back to Damascus and in his spiritual strength confounds the Jews dwelling in Damascus as he proves that the Christ is the one who was killed on the cross. While preaching to those he once went to arrest the tables become turned and others plot against his life. Let the watchers guard the gates day and night! The disciples are equally keen and they lower Saul from a window in the wall. That night the counter-plot is effective and a great leader is saved to accomplish a mighty work in Kingdom-building. Doubtless as he turned his back on the city, that place was sought out where the Lord had appeared to him and called him by name, "Saul, Saul." Coming to that sacred place he would kneel in prayer and consecration. From thence his marching orders must have been "Jerusalem," the very place where the powerful Sanhedrin sat. It requires faith to be a Christian and always go forward at the command of the Great Captain of our salvation.

THE situation is very interesting at Jerusalem. The disciples do not believe that an actual conversion has taken place. Saul's past still clung to him. Doors were closed against him. Many men and women at such a time have been so disheartened they have gone back to their old and base life.

Barnabas evidently knows the facts of those three years in Saul's life and brings this distrusted man to the apostles and declares his good works as proofs of his announced change of heart. That Saul had preached Christ at Damascus was a convincing argument. At first Saul is accepted for Barnabas' sake. Turn to your Bible dictionary and concordance and find out all you can about Barnabas. He, too, is a man to be reckoned with.

* If there was any place on earth where Saul, under the conditions that then existed, might have been expected to remain silent, that city was Jerusalem. Here, however, he preaches boldly in his Lord's name. He goes still further and finds certain Grecian Jews with whom he enters into argumentative debate. He lives the great truths which later he writes in letters and may have said first in a Jerusalem sermon, "I am not ashamed of the gospel: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." (Romans 1:6.)

There is still the home town, Tarsus, and when there is a Jerusalem plot to kill him, the Jerusalem brethren conduct this fiery preacher to Caesarea, whence he sails to the city of his birth. The words of Christ in that binding commission were Paul's strength in his Journey: "and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Jerry of Justamere Cabin

There were four of them: The Major; Mrs. Major, who was just what I'd always dreamed a mother ought to be; Kent, a big chap, nearly sixteen, and very strong; and Kate. She was a youngster of thirteen or fourteen, but she was about as tall as I and quite an odd girl in many ways.

I think father had taken the Lake Club cottage in a trade. He had owned it for several years, but he had never spent more than a day or two there, and this was my very first visit. Lake Club had about a hundred members. Most of them had summer homes grouped around the lake. It was not a large lake but it was very pretty, and the property was well laid out. There were some very fine homes upon which the owners had spent thousands of dollars. But the one that we owned was a very humble affair that would probably have ranked about 99 in a possible 100. It was called Justamere Cabin, and the name was a fit.

I was ashamed of the place as soon as I set eyes on it. I hoped people would think it belonged to the Bassels. I didn't want any such a freak tacked on to my family tree, so to speak.

First off, I think, it had been built for a large three-roomed shack. Then someone had built a kitchen on the back. Then a sun-parlor had been stuck on the south. Then an extra sleeping room had been put on the east, and, later, another one on the west. Some sleeping-porches had been added to all that; and, off by the kitchen, opening outdoors, a little bathroom had been built.

Talk about your House of Seven Gables! This Justamere Cabin was a solid mass of garbled gables.

Once it had been painted green. The green had faded. I suppose nothing on earth looks worse than faded green. It had faded more on the sides than the front so that the old shack at least put its best face forward.

BUT in spite of everything the Bassels just went into ecstasies over that old shack. Kate said it was just the dearest thing she had seen in years.

I said, "Don't think you have to say nice things about this shack to save my feelings. I think it is about as good as an old soap box with the painted label almost scratched off. That's about how good I think it is."

But she was most indignant. "Why, you foolish boy," she said. "Do you think I'd say anything just to please you? Where have you lived all your life not to see how darling this romantic little cabin is? So informal and unconventional. Everything odd. Not a single thing as you'd expect it. It's just too darling for words."

She, rather prides herself on her grown-up talk, does this Kate.

"You wait till it rains," I said. "Wait until you spend a romantic but rainy night under the many-gabled roof trying to find a dry spot. Then you'll know."

Of course I didn't really know that the roof was leaky, for I never had seen the place before. As a matter of fact it turned out to be a very good roof. But I didn't propose to have a girl like Kate telling me what was the proper thing. So I shot my bolt and went to look around the club grounds all by myself. I would have taken Kent with me, but he had gone in to the city on the Interurban.

The more I rambled over the mile or so of woods that formed the club grounds the more dissatisfied and ashamed I became of Justamere Cabin. It was like a picture of the kind they call a pastoral scenario or words to that effect. You would be shut in by beautiful, green trees in full foliage. Suddenly as you step past a clump of elms you see a beautiful cottage with white frame and green roof completely surrounded by a network of screened porches, with stuccoed columns, and you know that you are looking upon a home of romance. Probably a fair young maiden will step from that front door and will mount a beautiful chestnut steed and ride gracefully away. Some romance about that. But you'd be sure not to get anything of the kind at Justamere.

Well, I saw a lot of places of this description around the lake and finally I reached the substantial club-house. It is quite a good structure, though built more for use than beauty. But it is big and provides plenty of room for parties and meetings and dinners, and the wide porch is a great place to sit on a lazy day.

A BOY was fishing from a dock in front of the club-house.

"Catch anything?" I asked. He reached down and pulled out of the lake a string of ten fish of various kinds and sizes.

"Want to buy?" he asked. I hadn't supposed club boys would be so mercenary, but I did want the fish. I found I had only $2.70, but he let me have them for the two dollars. The fact is I never had caught fish, but I just wanted to surprise that boy Kent who would be coming in on the Interurban in a few minutes.

There is a little station near the club-house with a couple of park seats standing outside, just where passengers alight.

As I saw the train coming I stood idly leaning over the back of one of the seats with my string of fish carelessly exposed in front of me on the seat where they showed to very good advantage. It would be a surprise to Kent.

But Kent did not come. I waited until all the passengers alighted. The most conspicuous was a tall, stooped man who had evidently been on a journey. He had two heavy satchels which he deposited right in front of the seat where I had my exhibit.

"Did you say that your boy Jack was coming down to the landing with your boat?" he asked of his companion.

"Yes. He'll be here soon. We can give you a lift with these heavy bags. Row you over as far as the Justamere Cabin dock anyway. By the way, you knew Ned Bassel—he's Major Bassel now. He's at the place this summer."

"Bassel!" exclaimed the tall, stooped man, "Bassel! Why he's dead!"

"No. He was a prisoner. He's home now and here at the lake."

The tall man looked queer. He acted like a man who is rattled and doesn't know what to do next. Then suddenly he flopped down on the seat behind him—right on my string of fish.

I don't know much about fish. I never caught any before and I never did sit down on a mess. I know the boy warned me to be careful they didn't "fin" me, and perhaps that is what they did to him. Anyway he jumped up quicker than he sat down and shouted, "Oh! What's cutting me? Who did that?"

Then as he turned and saw me he started after me in a wild chase. But I had a fair start and even Kate Bassel would have to admit that I can run, so he soon was left behind.

CHAPTER II

WILD beasts were after me. Mingled with them were still wilder men. There were some women, too, and they were worst of all because of the hate in their faces.

They were crowding close up to me. They had long, clutchy claws, had the beasts, and the men and women had fingers that were like talons. They were grossly distorted in form and shape at first, but gradually they took on the looks of a gang of desperadoes.

I knew who I was now that I recognized the crowd that was chasing me. I was Two Gun Jerry, of course. If I turned on this gang they would soon be running the other way. But suppose that one of their bullets should penetrate my heart or lungs before I could turn? Even now I could feel the blood gushing over my chest and soaking my clothing.

I woke up, just then, sweating all over, and shaking so that my teeth chattered.

My! That was a nasty dream. I had been so sleepy and tired when I turned in that I had gone to bed without the least dread, for once. And here I was, in the middle of a black night, wide awake, wringing wet, and shivering in the cool night breeze that came off the

GOODYEAR Tires have always been notable for economy. Year after year, they have returned their users great service at little cost. Today, they are better tires than they have ever been before. In the past few months we have made more improvements in them than in any like period in our history. Goodyear Tires are now larger, heavier, stronger. In every size, they are stouter and more durable. If you want on your car the most economical tire equipment obtainable—buy Goodyear Tires. More people ride on Goodyear Tires than on any other kind.

Everyone Says It's Great

We wish you could meet Aunt Belle personally. She is a splendid type—modern, practical, intelligent and efficient—the sort of woman that any harassed young mother would delight to have drop in and advise about Baby.

She has succeeded most remarkably in putting into her book something of her own buoyant personality and common sense viewpoint regarding baby culture. After reading it you will feel that bringing up a baby isn't so mysterious and difficult after all.

It's an intensely practical book, but as readable as a novel. You will consult it constantly during the first two years at least. It is carefully indexed for this purpose.

Please don't imagine, because we publish it, that it is just a talcum book. Aunt Belle, of course, advises you to use Mennen Borated Talcum and Mennen Kora-Konia, but only because she believes that both are indispensable for Baby's toilet.

Aunt Belle's Baby Book is an expensive one to make and would ordinarily sell for at least a dollar. We shall be glad to send you a copy for 25 cents.

Please send at once before the edition is exhausted.

lake and wandered at will through the unglazed windows of our open house.

How I wished that I might drop back to sleep. But not a sign of sleep could I feel. The mysterious night noises of the woods made my blood creep. There was dread in every sound. What strange shapes might come stealing out of that dense gloom into which I peered. What was the mysterious object that seemed to approach and recede and approach? Gradually it was drawing nearer. A moment's recoil and it came again, nearer than ever. Now it was so near that I could almost feel it groping for me.

I gave one yell, and lay back on my cot with shut eyes and quivering body.

THEN I heard the quiet, steady voice of the Major.

"Hullo, Jerry. Did you call me?"
"N-n-n-no, Major; not exactly that. I woke and I thought I saw something and I just hollered. It seemed to be coming right at me. See, there it is now!"

"Yes, I see. It's a sheet that mother threw over a wire line to screen your bed. The wind sends it toward you. It begins to look like a sheet now, doesn't it? Think you can go back to sleep?"

"Yes, Major," I said. But I doubted it very much, and I was awfully glad that he didn't take my word for it, but came over and tucked an extra blanket around me, and sat down by my bed.

"Your teeth are chattering, Jerry; and you are all wet."

"Had an awful dream, Major. I was being chased by something terrible. You can't guess how bad it feels."

"I guess I can, Jerry. Remember you are talking to an A. E. F. veteran who has had 'shell-shock' marked on his medical field record."

"That's pretty bad, I reckon, Major."

"It is for the fellows who don't get over it. I'm pretty well over mine."

"Did it just get well?"

"Not altogether. It was pretty stubborn. My shrapnel wounds had healed and my broken shoulder was good as ever, and yet that shell-shock kept me in such a fix that I'd have spells when I was just about paralyzed. I couldn't talk, couldn't move, couldn't swallow, couldn't breathe more than just enough to keep going."

"My, but that was terrible. How did you get over it?"

"I found an odd remedy. There was a Y. M. C. A. man in the same ward, getting over some burns from a gas shell. When he saw me in a bad way, he would come to me, look me square in the eyes and smile into my face."

"You're at it again, Major," he'd say. 'Now look at me. Look close at me, Major. Look at this face of mine. All scarred up, isn't it? A pretty poor face for what used to be a good-looking man. Don't you dare think of yourself, now. Think of me. See me smile. See me laugh. I'm laughing in spite of this face, Major. I'm laughing because if I did get all this, I got it for you and fellows like you. I got it so I might make you forget about the terrible times you've had; so I might help make a man of you again. Now, don't you dare think of yourself. Look at my face and laugh. Come on, now, laugh!'"

"And after a while I'd laugh. And I'd breathe easier, and I'd begin to swallow again, and I'd relax just the way you're doing, and I'd go to sleep the way you are going to do."

I lay there holding on to the Major's hand. It was a good, warm hand, and so steady you'd never think its owner had been shell-shocked. I was comfortable again. Instead of wild beasts and wilder men I saw the kind face of the Major, and I began to try to imagine the beautiful smile that must have been on the face of that Y. M. C. A. man who could be glad he was disfigured so that he might help men like the Major.

I CAN'T tell much that followed because I fell asleep, but when I awoke in the morning I felt rested and strong in spite of my distress of the early night. Kent was out of bed already and getting into his bathing-suit.

"I hope you brought a swimming-suit," he shouted.

"Sure thing," said I. "I got a nice, new one—crimson and white."

"Fine!" he declared. "Let's go swim!"

"Not as early as this," I objected. "It's cold."

"You mean cool," replied Kent. "Nicest time of day to swim."

He made me mad, standing there so superior and telling me things as if I didn't know anything. I jumped into my suit.

"Where's a good place to dive?" he asked.

"I don't know," I told him. "This place is as new to me as to you."

"You're right," he agreed. "There's a diving-board near our dock."

Now Kent and I had talked about swimming before, and I reckon I'd given him every reason to believe that I was one of these natural water babies, midway between a duck and a freshwater fish. But strip my romance down to its bare fact and I couldn't so much as dog paddle.

The nearer we came to that deep place where the diving-board was, the more clearly did I realize that any jump that I made from that board would be sure to bring on a lot of excitement, and that subsequent events might call for the use of grappling hooks, the pulmotor and all manner of costly apparatus. Little wonder that my footsteps dragged a trifle.

"Come on," urged Kent. "Hurry. But don't go diving off without testing the depth. It might be shallow, so don't be rash."

"I won't be rash," I agreed. "You go ahead and do anything you like. I think I'll just watch, this morning."

"Not go in?" exclaimed Kent. "Why this is a dandy morning for a swim. Bet you're afraid to get that pretty suit wet."

I T WAS a welcome suggestion, for in any way out seemed like a good way. "So I am," I admitted. "I think I'll send it back to the store. Don't like this crimson, so maybe I'll have the suit changed for a different color. What color would you think might suit me?"

"How'd yellow do?" said Kent, quick as a flash.

Furious! I never was so mad in my life. I would punch his big face. I would murder him. I never would speak to him again in my life. I would—

What I really did do was to run out on the end of that diving-board and jump splash into that lake, in what I thought was a dive, but really was a kind of a backward flip with the spring all out of it.

There was an interminable period of being under the water and then a few seconds of thrashing about on top, churning the water like a dozen side-wheelers. Down I went again and this time I seemed to stay for hours. I came up, gasping but conscious, and turned again to fight such portions of the lake as I had not swallowed.

Then I felt something pushing and hauling at my crimson and white bathing suit. I grabbed without catching anything. I grabbed wildly again. My hand struck a rock projecting from the bank and I clutched desperately. There was Kent pushing me up, his eyes big, his face white as chalk, and water running from him everywhere so that I couldn't see whether he was crying or not. He didn't say a word until he had managed to push me up so that I scrambled out and lay panting on the bank. In two seconds he was bending over me.

"Are y'all right?" he cried in a hoarse whisper. "Are y'all right? I never suspected you couldn't swim. Thought you just hated the cold water. Are y'all right?"

"I reckon I will be if I ever get my breath back," I said. "I did hate the cold water, but I ain't afraid of it. Want me to do that double flip again?"

"No, you little idiot," he said, almost affectionately. "I want you to get up and get warm and then we'll go to breakfast and never breathe a word about this to anyone. But now it's all over, I'm glad it happened. I know for sure that there isn't any yellow streak in you. We'll be good buddies from now on, won't we?"

I TOLD my dad about this, a long time after. He said Kent's point wasn't logical. What I did was rash, not brave, and didn't prove the point at all. But, however that may be, we went back to the cottage, a while later, after I had got my breath and a little warmth into my body, with a different feeling between us, and one that would last.

I was quite equal to a good breakfast, and I think both the Major and Mrs. Bassel were quite surprised at my performance. I had just put away the last of Mrs. Bassel's delicious cakes that I dared engage, when I saw coming towards the cottage the tall, stooped man who had sat on my fish.

Major Bassel saw him at the same moment."

"Look who's coming," he exclaimed. "It's George Persmann; I declare!"

"So it is!" said Mrs. Bassel. "Oh, I do hope that he has come to tell you that he knows all about those securities."

I had just a faint idea that his errand might have something to do with the mess of fish upon which he made such an impression, so, asking to be excused from the table, I left the room and slipped into the little bathroom which is just off the dining-room and allows you to hear everything.

He certainly came in like a breath of balmy spring or as good an imitation of it as he could produce.

"Why, Bassel," he shouted, "you don't know how glad I am to see you. I just heard last night that you were still in the land of the living. You see I've lost no time coming to see you for myself."

"It's mighty good of you, old man," said the Major. "I'm tremendously glad to see you. I'm in hopes that you are going to lift a great load from my shoulders."

"Anything that mortal man can do," Persmann assured him. "What is it?"

"It goes back to my last day in the office. I took in a package of securities from Mr. Wright, the treasurer of the Home for Disabled Ministers. I was too much excited to know exactly what I was doing. But don't you remember me giving you that package and asking you to take care of it?"

"Why, Bassel, old man, I'd like to say I remember, but I'm afraid it would hurry my imagination a little too much. You know there were a good many of us. Perhaps you gave the stuff to Meadows. He worked next to you."

THAT was enough. I saw a blank look come into the Major's kind face, as if all the joy in the world had been ready for him and then had done a fade-out. I wondered if the old shell-shock would get him again.

Mrs. Bassel said something to fill the gap, and after a bit the Major spoke again in a dull, lifeless kind of a way, and pretty soon the chap went away and I came out and found Kent.

"That man Persmann is a fraud," I said to Kent. I told him of last night's incident. "I hope this won't bring on the Major's old shell-shock."

"No, father is all over that," Kent was quite positive. "But it's a great blow. There remains only one person who was in the office at that time, who has not been asked about the securities. That is a boy of about fifteen who was doing work as office boy. He was a nephew or something of Persmann's. Not much hope from him. But don't think that you will find father shell-shocked or even down in the mouth about it. He'll be all right."

Sure enough I found the Major quite calm and cheerful when I went back. He was down at our dock examining an old boat that Kent and I had pulled out of the mud of a little sluice that emptied into the lake. A club member who was fishing near it had told us that it had been there at least two years without anyone to claim it. As a matter of fact it had been so submerged as to be almost lost to sight.

"Better clean it up a little more, Jerry," the Major suggested. "You can't tell where the leaks are for the mud and rust."

The old boat was a galvanized iron affair. Kent and I turned it on its side and scrubbed and scraped it inside and out.

When we got through she was so clean that we could see every little leak. There were plenty of them but no big ones. I knew how to fix leaks of that kind. It was one of the things my work at Manual High had taught me. In the basement of the club-house were some solder and a soldering iron and Major Bassel had a gasoline torch, so I was easily equipped.

IN TWO hours every leak in that boat was soldered and she floated high and dry. Kent said I was a wonder. I felt as proud of that boat as Noah did when he had the ark all finished.

"Let's paint her," I suggested.

"After a while," said the Major. "First we must make sure it is unclaimed."

"Oh, that's all right, father," said Kent. "It's been lying waste for two years."

"That proves nothing," insisted the Major. "It was out of use and out of sight. Someone may remember it now that you've raised it."

Nevertheless I did at least paint a name: "The Invincible."

Kent shook his head when he saw it.

"I'm afraid that name will just make father feel bad," he said.

"No it won't," I objected. "I believe it will do him good."

We all went out in the boat that afternoon and there the proud name remained: "The Invincible."

That night I was so tired that I went to bed as soon as it was dark. But I slept sound until early morning. Then I jumped into my swimming-suit and ran down to our dock to get an early look at the boat of which I was so proud.

But someone had done the meanest thing in the world.

"The Invincible" no longer floated at our dock. She had been stolen.

The Story of Five Little Orphans

By MARY W. BACHELER

(Of the American Baptist Mission, Balasore, Orissa, India)

SOME years ago when there was a sore famine in India and many children were orphaned, your excellent paper The Christian Herald, raised a fund, collected the orphans, distributed them among the different Missions, and supported them for years. About a dozen little girls came to us. They were not very robust and some of them died. Five are still with us.

Bochora passed through our Girls' School, took Teacher Training, taught a Mission school for several years till her health broke down, and we brought her home. When she was sufficiently recovered, we sent her to Bible Training School, and she has just completed the two years' course. We are sending her back for a six months' course.

Jobo was in the Orphanage and school till she grew up, then she married and had an interesting family. Last winter she lost her husband and two children, and now she is left alone with one little boy. She is a Zenana teacher.

Nirpote proved to have leprosy and we sent her away to a Leper Asylum in a neighboring Mission.

Bhani went to study nursing in a neighboring Mission Hospital, and did well. The missionaries sent her to a Bible School and she is now back with us for the holidays. She is a good girl, steady and reliable.

Josmoni was the "baby of the bunch." She was in our Girls' School, and then went to the English Baptist Mission Training School, and is now in the Balasore Zenana work. She may soon be leaving us to join a sister Mission.

These are but five of the many children rescued by the Christian Herald from death or worse and given a chance in the world. Four Christian workers by God's grace raised up out of nothing! I wish you could see their bright and intelligent faces, full of possibilities of future service. Surely it was a blessed work the Christian Herald did years ago, when it rescued these little ones. God bless you and make you more and more a blessing to others!

Insurance medical examiners find greatest significance attached to under weight

Are you under weight?

Forty-three life insurance companies teach new facts of vast importance to under weight persons

MOST of us have no idea of our physical unsoundness; most of all the under weight person, who has been allowed to think that there is security in his condition. Millions of examinations prove that under weight persons are more subject to disease, particularly tuberculosis, and are shorter lived.

Many people are below normal but do not know it

"What showed us where we stand physically," said a recent writer, "was, of course, revealed by the draft. That one-third of the young men of the country had some serious defect, showed the enormous amount of disease and disability that so many people bear unconsciously.

"And if the percentage of physical unfitness ran this high in our young men, it must be far greater among the rest of our people."

Does your body tear down more in a day than it builds up in a night?

Apparently millions expend more in energy than they replace by nourishment, with the result that bodily vigor and resistance to disease attack is lessened. Many people finding themselves in this condition, and seeking to upbuild themselves without the use of medicine, are turning to Yeast Foam. Science has found that yeast is the richest source of the appetite-giving, body-building element called vitamin. Most foods do not supply sufficient quantity to assure normal health.

Yeast Foam will build you up

It is many times more plentiful even than milk in the indispensable vitamin that causes growth and health. If you need upbuilding, you may have the experience of thousands of others in finding that this familiar food, added to your regular diet, will increase your appetite so that more food will be desired and additional food actually eaten.

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals

Many eat the yeast cake plain, washing it down with a little water or milk. You'll soon like the taste. Some prefer to take a bite of yeast cake and a bite of cracker. Others carry a package of Yeast Foam around with them and eat a cake at convenient times. Use coupon for more information.

WHO can account for the whims of Fashion? Women don't attempt to. They simply accept them. And how quickly are those whims sensed and felt to be inevitable?

So the vogue of Florient Talc comes very naturally as an outcome of the present mode. The art of the Orient enriches every phase of Fashion's fancies. Oriental colorings and designs in costume call for "Flowers of the Orient" in the boudoir.

Florient Talc best carries out the feeling of this art. Its perfume seems a very part of these costly fabrics.

The color too, is different, a warm Oriental tone, just off the white.

And again one senses another vogue—a new use of Florient Talc. For while it is fulfilling the duty of an after-the-bath powder, Florient Talc imparts a delicate fragrance which lingers exquisitely about the woman who uses it—as a powdered perfume.

Reading for Recreation

E. L., Ecc., 12: 10, 11

THE author of this reference was a wise man. His book will furnish not only recreation but wisdom. Reading for recreation only is not the reading that is profitable. It is possible to read for recreation and learn at the same time. No doubt he was a reader and his book is evidently the net result of his digging and delving in the lore of his age. It will be remembered that the author of the book of Ecclesiastes also said, "Of making many books there is no end and much study is a weariness of the flesh." What would he say in this day when the mails and stands and homes and libraries are crowded with all kinds of books and magazines? Truly much of the reading matter of this age can be characterized as the stuff that makes the flesh weary and the mind a storehouse for rubbish. On the other hand there are innumerable books both in prose and poetry that no one can afford not to read. Likewise are they within the reach and purse of all who care to peruse them.

For the understanding and enjoyment of good reading we recommend the reading of "What Can Literature Do for Me?" by C. Alphonso Smith. Here are the chapter headings: It Can Give You an Outlet; It Can Keep Before You the Vision of the Ideal; It Can Give You a Better Knowledge of Human Nature; It Can Restore the Past to You; It Can Show You the Glory of the Commonplace; It Can Give You the Mastery of Your Own Language.

This meeting can be made very interesting if every member would discuss a recent book, telling the reason for its helpfulness. Make this a "Literary Evening" and while you are at it do not forget the fountain head of all good literature and splendid inspiration, the Bible. Many of the great classic stories and not a little of the modern fiction is based on the story of the gospel.

Good literature is "medicine for the mind." To be a reader is the same as being a world citizen not only of this age but ages past.

The Perils of Materialism

C. E., and B. Y. P. U., I John 2: 15-17

WHAT is materialism? If we get a good definition we shall have a good exposition. Theoretically materialism is the doctrine that all the facts of experience are to be explained by purely material processes and causes. It denies the reality of the soul as spiritual and it denies a spiritual God. In other words the theory eliminates the soul and God from the scheme of things. The theory of materialism takes many forms but it resolves itself into an attempt to explain this universe and all life by purely material terms.

Practical materialism is the tendency to have undue regard for material and present interests and comforts. It stresses devotion to things seen and felt, to bodily and material necessities or desires. The Apostle John warns against this sort of materialism in the reference of our topic in the words, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world." We are not to ignore the factors that assist us to make a living, but we must stress the factors that assist us in the making of a life more than anything else. In short, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul."

It is a truism for all time that "man does not live by bread only." The crumb-and-crust, wheat-and-yeast doctrine robs the soul of its highest claims. A boy just starting in a business career said, "I am going to make it the business of my life to make $20,000 a year." That was a worthy ambition provided he could make that sum without injury to his ideals or without detriment to somebody else. There must be room in the life for God and the values of his Kingdom, for service and fellowship, friendships and inspirations and all good things.

Mar-Saba, the Ancient

scatter for them about the stone-paved courtyards.

We stooped low to enter the cave around which the Monastery is erected, where in his earlier years, St. Sabas, so the legends say, lived in the daily companionship of a lion. In the library we saw some really priceless manuscripts, though most of the treasures have been transferred for safer keeping to the Patriarchal Library in Jerusalem.

Our time was swiftly passing, and we remembered the long twelve miles that lay between us, and our really comfortable hotel in Jerusalem. So our guide led us to the guest-room, a spacious chamber high up in air, from whose windows stretched a view long to be remembered for its wild and solitary grandeur. We wrote our names in the visitors' book. The last signature was that of a Russian nobleman some four months previous. Then while we waited for the coming of the inevitable cup of coffee, we looked about us. In an alcove over a white spread bed, hung an icon, but on the walls of the room two rudely framed blotches of color invited examination. They were two cheap prints, the one representing Dewey's victory at Manila on a certain first of May, and the other a riotous charge up San Juan Hill, led by a stalwart figure in khaki, whose firmly clinched teeth made his personality unmistakable. Could anything be more utterly incongruous—here at Mar Saba, hard by the Dead Sea? Dewey at Manila and Roosevelt at San Juan! The dragoon was mildly interested, but to us it was an indescribable climax.

Now came the coffee, thick and sweet, but wonderfully comfortable.

And we left the guest-room, our eyes lingering upon the wonderful pictures. As we passed along the stone-cut balconies, shady now, as the sun had swung behind the western edge of the gorge, a tall, black-robed, bearded monk started suddenly from one of the numerous cell-like holes in the wall, and grasping our arm, as he fell into step, whispered with feverish earnestness "How's business now in Chicago?"

Shades of the Occident! furtive breezes of Lake Michigan! beloved odors of our rippling river—what do you here on the other side of the world? "Chicago!" we gasped, "what do you know about Chicago?" "Three years ago," said this pale-faced, black-bearded phantom of the rocks of Mar Saba, "I was in business on Clybourne Ave!"

The Monastery bell set up a tuneful clamor, and into the shadow of the rocks the surprising phantom faded away. What he had done—what fault or crime had sent him half around the world from Clybourne Avenue, we shall never know, but as, the donkeys saddled, we rode to the crest of the desert ridge, that looks down upon the domes and walls of Mar-Saba, we saw a solitary figure standing on the topmost tower. The desert breeze made his black gown flutter as he stood there a single living thing, in a vast symphony of silence. We unsung our glasses and trained them on the tower. Yes, it was he, the merchant of Clybourne Avenue, and as we looked, we seemed to hear his insistent, all-absorbing whisper, "How's business now in Chicago?"

The donkey boys shouted "hei! hei!" and Mar Saba vanished from our sight, as hoofs clattering, and stones flying, we scurried down the rocky hill.

The World News of the Week

lass White. His nomination, which had been expected, was confirmed by the Senate on the same day it was announced, with only four Senators opposing it. Senator Borah led the brief fight against approval of the appointment, on the grounds that the former President had been engaged in politics instead of law for many years and that he lacked only seven years of the age for retirement. Only one Senator on the Democratic side opposed the appointment; and Senator Underwood, the Democratic floor leader, spoke urging prompt confirmation.

President Harding explained that he had made the appointment at this time because of the congestion in the Federal Courts and in order that the new Chief Justice might devote himself to the judicial reorganization now in progress. The Supreme Court will not reassemble until October. The nomination was sent to the Senate, Mr. Harding said, without consultation with Mr. Taft. Mr. Taft in Montreal, where he was engaged in an arbitration case, said: "It has been the ambition of my life to be Chief Justice, but now that it is gratified I tremble to think whether I can worthily fill the position and be useful to the country."

PRESIDENT SIGNS ARMY BILL. President Harding has signed the Army Appropriation bill, under which the regular army must be reduced to 150,000 men by October 1, but at the same time he sent a message to Congress suggesting it might be necessary to ask for modifications to provide for the 50,000 who will be dropped.

DR. FARRAND TO HEAD CORNELL. Dr. Livingston Farrand, chairman of the Central Committee of the American Red Cross, has been elected president of Cornell University at Ithaca, N. Y., succeeding Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, recently confirmed as Minister to China. Dr. Farrand formerly was professor of Anthropology at Columbia University and later was president of the University of Colorado.

BRITISH COAL STRIKE SETTLED. The strike of British coal miners has been settled after lasting nearly three months by the miners' abandonment of their demand for a national wages pool and by Parliamentary sanction of the renewal of the government's grant of $50,000,000 to the mining industry. The minimum wage standard was set at 20 per cent. above the pre-war level, and the mine owners are to take $17 as profits for every $100 paid in standard wages. If further proceeds are to be divided, 83 per cent. is to go to the workmen and 17 per cent. to the owners.

ITALIAN MINISTRY RESIGNS. The Giolitti Cabinet in Italy has resigned following its defeat by a vote of 234 to 200 in the Chamber of Deputies on a question of foreign policy. Since no party has anywhere near a majority in the Chamber and it was difficult to effect a combination which could command a majority, there was delay in the selection of a new premier.

On Mission Fields

FORTY Chinese Y. M. C. A. boys have formed a Social Improvement Club and have undertaken the task of cleaning up their section of Shanghai. Part of their work consists of introducing the garbage pail and warning people of the danger of flies. Last summer they reached at least 150,000 people.

Boy scout training is the best thing in the world for the future citizens of Armenia, according to relief workers there. Discipline in the orphanages is almost impossible unless the children can be organized into some form of self-government, but one American scout master can put no end of pep into hundreds of destitute Armenian boys.

Thirteen years ago, missionary Zahn of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Iowa, went to New Guinea and began work among the natives, who were then largely heathen. There were many cannibals in the territory. A letter recently received from Morobe, shows wonderful spiritual progress. A large proportion of the islanders have renounced heathenism and given up their instruments of witchcraft. It is estimated that eight thousand of them have been received into the Christian Church.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any questions addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters, nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

MRS. L. M. G., Greensburg, Ind. If, as your letter states, you prayed that your desire might be granted if in accordance with God's will, then you have not prayed amiss. Our Heavenly Father knows what is best and He will always give comfort and consolation if we ask for it. Your letter has been sent to the Prayer League.

Mrs. M. T. S., Washington, D. C. We sympathize with you deeply in your serious trouble and have sent your letter to the Prayer League, where it will be made the subject of special imploration at several meetings. Join your own prayers with those of the League, and pray for faith and courage.

C. O. M., Trenton, N. J., sends this note of encouragement, which no doubt represents the experience of many other readers: "In your paper on the editorial page, the article 'Passing It On' quite interested me, and I am glad to see that others have tried to get the good out of it as I do. When my copy comes, my wife generally tries to read it before I take it with me where I work at the P. R. R. from 3 P.M. until 11 P.M. every day. I have some time to myself when I can read, and I get a deal of good out of the Christian Herald. For me, it is next to the Bible. When I have read it, I lend it to an old lady who is confined to the house most of the time. She is one of the kind that is full of the grace of God, and it would do you good to talk to her. She cannot get out to Church and the Herald does her lots of good. Then she returns it to me, and sometimes I lend it to the Vineland Soldiers' Home, to a friend, or I mail it to others who I know do not take it. During the war I would have it sent to the soldiers."

D. D. Blauch, Johnstown, Pa., writes: "In a recent issue W. E. L., La Mesa, Cal., asks 'Is it inconsistent to think there was on earth in early times intelligent animal life in the form of man?' etc. I believe he will find the key to his question in the second book of Esdras. From the evidence given in the Books of Ezra, Esdras and in Chronicles, Esdras was the Ezra of the Old Testament record, he was the last of the high priests of the direct line of Aaron, and hence qualified to write just such a work. Esdras divides time into hours, minutes and seconds. There are 12 hours of day for each hemisphere, which equal 720 minutes, and 43,200 seconds, which he gives as equal to the time in years of the six days of the creative period, and the seventh day of rest (7,200 years) making a cycle of 50,400 years. Adam, was not created till the closing period of the sixth day; this would leave 14,400 between the ordination of Enoch (as given by Esdras 6:49) and the creation of Adam. This interval gives ample time for the development of the pre-Adamic race, of which mere mention is made in the 6th chapter of Genesis as 'Nephilim.' In the fifth chapter of 2 Esdras the angel Uriel said to Esdras, 'Consider thou therefore also, how that ye are less of stature than those that were before you.' The 6th chapter of Genesis indicates that it was the intermixture of this pre-Adamic race with the Adamites that produced an ungodly race of giants, or Gibborim. Cain was probably the first to get married among the mixed race, and opened the door for its further development, which became so corrupt that this mixed giant race took the daughters of the Adamic race by force, because they were fair (white). This was displeasing to God, and he shortened the lives of this mixed race to 120 years; but even this did not stop its progress, until all were destroyed by flood."

Professor H. W. Frueauff, Allentown, Pa., writes: "Some time ago I stated in the Christian Herald that Mr. R. Dan Wolterbeck, New York City, had died. Your many readers will remember how devoted he was to the work of the Interdenominational Leper Home, Bethesda, at Groot Chatillon, Surinam. I have just learned from Dr. Paul de Schweinitz that he has been successful in securing the services of Messrs. William Schall & Co., Foreign Trade Department, Export Division, 45 William Street, New York City, in accepting and forwarding packages of clothing, old linen and bandages from your charitable readers. When sending any contributions, please state the contents and value of the package, as this information is to be handed to the Custom House."

G. R., Newark, N. J. The passage in Jer. 8:21, "I am black," etc., is interpreted as meaning that their faces were sad and gloomy, dark in visage with grief, as though one should say "the whole world looketh black." See a similar passage in Joel 2:6: "All faces shall gather blackness."

J. C. F., Glen Spey, N. Y. There has been wide discussion of Matt. 27:52, 53. The "sleeping saints" are held to be Old Testament believers who, having served the Lord faithfully according to their lights, and who looked forward to the promise of the Messiah's coming, were quickened at the moment of Jesus' death, although they did not come out of their graves until his resurrection. The opening of the graves was symbolic proclamation that death was "swallowed up in victory"; and the rising of the saints after Jesus' resurrection fittingly showed that the Saviour of the world was to be the "first" that should rise from the dead. (See Acts 26:23; Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5). There is no further record from which your final question can be answered.

W. E. S., Grenada, Miss. The Marys spoken of in the New Testament are: Mary the mother of Christ, Mary Magdalene, Mary the sister of Lazarus, Mary the wife of Cleophas (John 19:25) and Mary the mother of John (Acts 12:12).

C. F., Brunswick, Ga., writes: "I am a reader of your Christian Herald and have been for the past eighteen months or more. It comes as a blessing into my home. It is one of the greatest of its kind, and the Bible and the Christian Herald are my daily companions. Rev. J. H. Jowett's Meditation of Jan. 1, 1921, from Psa. 4:1, 'Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress,' came to me during an adverse condition of life, but through the power of the Holy Spirit, I have been made stronger. A sermon by Dr. Jowett of March, 1921, on 'Power for Witnessing,' from Acts 1:8 and another in April, 1921, on 'The Ministry of Individuality' (1 Cor. 9:1 and 15:7) have wonderfully helped me in my daily work for Christ and His Kingdom. I pray God's blessing upon the editor and every individual connected with this great paper. It will make a better Christian of any one who follows its advice."

We are gratified to learn from many letters similar to the above that the Sermons and Meditations in the Christian Herald are being used as a means of grace in many homes. While we cannot answer all the writers, we assure them that their kind words are a great spiritual encouragement to the editors and publishers.

Mrs. C. J. J., Hullsville, O. The passage in Psalm 90:3 is held by commentators to refer to the body reverting to the earth (see Gen. 3:19), returning to the dust from which it came. The entire Psalm supports this construction. It is in marked contrast with Psalm 91, which pictures the final triumph of the righteous, with the foregleams of salvation through God's mercy and loving kindness.

D. M., Corinth, N. Y. 1. The verses you mention (Mark 14:50-52) are held by commentators to describe an incident relating to Mark personally, and that he was the young man referred to. One authority writes: "We can only say that if the name of Mark is supplied, the narrative receives its most probable explanation. Arisen from sleep, or just preparing for it, he comes out to see the seizure of the betrayed Teacher, known to him and in some degree beloved already. His demeanor is such that some of the crowd are about to arrest him; then, fear overcoming shame, he leaves his garment in their hands and flees." 2. As far as can be ascertained, the Rosicrucians were unknown before the 17th Century, although the supposed founder, Christian Rosenkreuz, is said to have lived and written in the 14th century. The sect or cult was said to be devoted to the study of magic, and claimed to have discovered the secret of freedom from sickness and pain though not from death. They were bitterly denounced as heretics and sorcerers.

"Oh, Money! Money!"

"If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the key-note of Mrs. Porter's story.

DAWN

One of Eleanor H. Porter's recent full-length stories, originally published at $2.00. We will send a cloth-bound copy for 60 cents postpaid, during this special sale.

MARY-MARIE

A splendid full-length story by Eleanor H. Porter.

Now selling in another edition at $2.00. We will send a cloth-bound copy, postpaid, for $1.00.

Into countless thousands of homes the novels of Eleanor H. Porter have come as harbingers of sunshine and gladness. Wherever the English language is spoken, men and women have grown to recognize her supreme gift as an interpreter of the happy heart of childhood. As one woman wrote from a little mountain village in Kentucky, "More than any one else, Mrs. Porter gives back to us the joy of knowing that this is a beautiful world."

"CROSS ROADS"

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

This is a delightful volume of verse containing over 100 poems of the author, not published before in book form.

It is well printed from new large type plates, and attractively bound with cloth back and ornamental sides, specially designed for gift purposes.

We have sold thousands at the regular price of $1.25. During this special sale we will send a copy, postpaid, 85 cents.

THE CALL OF THE BELLS

By EDMUND MITCHELL

The story deals with such vital national issues as the reconciliation of capital and labor, the regeneration of the idle rich, the reclamation of the hobo, the dignity of toil, the moral strength of temperance and the more equitable distribution of wealth, comfort and happiness—these are among the big themes woven into the warp and woof of a throbbing story of human passions and frailties, vices and virtues, aspiration, struggle, and achievement. And through all runs the golden thread of optimism—the triumph of love and brotherhood and mutual helpfulness.

Originally published at $1.50. We will send a cloth-bound copy, postpaid, for 85 cents.

And so the day ends perfectly—

A GOOD vacation means above all else change of scene. The city-dweller longs for the country or shore.

The country-dwellers seek the excitement of metropolitan life.

Whichever class you are in you will find that Paramount has anticipated your motion picture wants.

In the country you will find that the fame of Paramount has penetrated to your resort, whether it be in a theatre that seats three hundred or three thousand. You can see the same fine Paramount Pictures there that you were accustomed to in town.

The visitors to the cities will discover any number of Paramount Pictures to choose from. Take train anywhere; take steamer or aeroplane, and you will inevitably arrive at one of the theatres on the Paramount circuit of enchantment.

Whether it is a million-dollar palace of the screen in the big city, or a tiny hall in a backwoods hamlet, you will find that it is always the best and most prosperous theatre in the community that is exhibiting Paramount Pictures.

They both show the same pictures! Paramount Pictures.

The resort that has Paramount Pictures is in the swim—a Broadway show in the heart of the country!

Paramount has achieved this national recognition by steadily delivering great entertainment.

—entertainment conceived and interpreted by the foremost actors, dramatists, directors, writers, impresarios and technicians, —photoplays made with the idea that each one had to beat the last,

—motion pictures so good that in the United States alone more than 11,200 theatres, not counting summer theatres, depend on them as the chief source of supply.

Whether you see Paramount Pictures in a metropolitan theatre or in a summer theatre that vanishes with the first frosts, you are equally sure of fine entertainment.

When you see that phrase, "It's a Paramount Picture," park your car, motor-boat or canoe and go in,

—because if it's a Paramount Picture it's the best show in vacation-land!

Scrapping the Human Scrap Heap

How One State Is Rehabilitating the Victims of Industrial Accidents

By LEWIS EDWIN THEISS

WHEN, in the course of a single five-year period the industrial workers in a single commonwealth suffer the loss of 328 arms, 434 legs, 564 feet, and 1,083 hands, while scores are killed outright, and practically all of those so injured are either thrown on the human scrap heap or very seriously impaired in earning ability, it is time to do something. That is what the legislature thought in Pennsylvania, where these industrial accidents occurred during the years, 1916 to 1920 inclusive. The result was the creation of the Bureau of Rehabilitation, which is a constituent part of the Pennsylvania Department of Labor and Industry. Its business is to salvage the wrecks in the state's human scrap heap and to mend broken workers so they can labor again.

The creation of this Bureau is humane legislation of an advanced kind. It is also mighty good business. As compensation for disability claims during this five-year period the state's industries paid to injured workers the huge sum of $17,078,312. Compensation paid for fatalities during the same period amounted to an additional $26,966,382. These sums totalling more than $44,000,000, are really a huge tax paid by industry and passed along to the public through increased prices.

This tax represents the direct cost of accidents in the industries of the state. But what about the indirect tax—the loss of the labor of these injured persons through long periods of years and the burden of supporting them, either privately or in public institutions? That tax will be greatly lessened in future through the work of the Bureau of Rehabilitation. That is why its creation is good business.

Industrial surveys have been so few and statistics are so meagre that heretofore we have hardly realized what an industrial accident means to the public at large, or what a tax it indirectly lays upon the public. During the year 1919 the industrial products of Pennsylvania were worth $8,850,000,000, while the state's agricultural products brought the total of all products for the year up to approximately $9,250,000,000, which sum is almost double the huge appropriation made that year by Congress.

If that sum be divided by the number of workers whose labor created that amount of wealth, we learn that the average production of each worker for the year was approximately $5,000. This means that for every 200 workers incapacitated for labor, the state lost, at that rate, $1,000,000 worth of products. In addition, the state, directly or indirectly, has to support those so incapacitated. If one hundred of the two hundred injured can be rehabilitated, can be restored to their full earning capacity, the loss in production and the burden for support is cut in half.

DURING its first fiscal year, ending early in 1921, the newly created Bureau of Rehabilitation has been of genuine constructive benefit to at least 750 injured workers. Some have been entirely rehabilitated. Some have been partly restored. Some are undergoing a course of training that will refit them for industrial service. The Bureau figures that each of these 750 persons will produce for the commonwealth $1,000 more of wealth in future than each could have produced without the help of the Bureau. If that estimate is correct, the service of this new Bureau in its first year has created in Pennsylvania $750,000 of future potential wealth.

S. S. Riddle, who is Chief of this new Bureau, calls his work "human engineering." That is an apt term.

And Chief Riddle and his associates may as aptly be called consulting human engineers. Their problem is threefold: first, to get into touch with those who are injured and win their confidence; second, to find out what can best be done with the human wrecks under their care; and third, to train them for the appropriate tasks and get them safely back in the state's industries as self-supporting units of society.

To get into touch with these injured people and win their confidence is not such an easy matter as may appear. To begin with, the Bureau is small, with only twelve field adjusters to cover the entire state, and it has to feel its way along; for this is a venture in a new direction. How is the Bureau, with its headquarters in a little office in Harrisburg, to know when John Doe loses his leg in a mine accident two hundred miles away? How is it to know when Susan Roe, working in a silk mill equally distant, gets her hand mashed in a cog-wheel? And when it has found out about them, how is it to win their confidence and get their co-operation—particularly when thousands of the state's workers can neither read nor write English and are naturally suspicious of strangers? These are some of the problems that have had to be solved by Chief Riddle in building up his human salvage corps.

TO ESTABLISH contacts with those injured, the Bureau of Rehabilitation has enlisted the co-operation of the Bureau of Workmen's Compensation, another branch of the Department of Labor and Industry. This latter Bureau receives daily reports concerning industrial injuries, and these reports have been available for the new Bureau of Rehabilitation. Through newspaper publicity, public addresses, circular letters, and other channels, the Bureau also seeks to establish contact with the injured. The Grange has been enlisted to put the Bureau in touch with injured farm workers.

Perhaps a very carefully prepared circular letter, which is sent with a questionnaire or registration blank to the injured, does more than almost any other agency to pave the way for the Bureau's work. This letter, bearing conspicuously the seal of the state, asks for preliminary information regarding the name, age, race, occupation, etc., of the person injured. The seal of the state carries great weight with the foreign-born, accustomed as they are to governmental restrictions; so that the circular letter seldom goes unheeded. If the recipient can not read English, he makes haste to put the letter in the hands of a friend who can. Such friend usually is scrupulous about filling out the blank and returning it to the Bureau of Rehabilitation. This letter gives the field adjuster preliminary information that is of great advantage to him. When he calls to see the injured person, he is fully prepared to meet the situation.

This is not always a simple problem. The physiological difficulties are often the least of the obstacles that stand in the way of the adjuster. Psychological,

This man, despite the loss of an arm, conducts a thriving blacksmith business—a striking example of what industrial rehabilitation can accomplish racial, and geographical problems are also encountered. Often the person injured is so discouraged that he is unwilling to try to get a fresh start. Often he is too old to be taught anything new. Often he is too illiterate to learn. Sometimes he is unwilling to leave his friends or move from the locality where he lives.

Any one of several lines of help may be necessary. The immediate need may be medical assistance. Or a new member may be necessary, with training in the use of that member. It may be advisable to teach the injured person to perform his old tasks with his new members or to learn to do work of an entirely different nature. The underlying idea is to fit the person by medical treatment and training so that, if possible, his earning capacity is not diminished, or at least diminished as little as possible. This may necessitate an entire change in the injured person's occupation, or his removal to another place of employment. Such violent changes come hard to those not young.

If an injured person needs a new member and is not financially able to buy it, the Bureau will assist in its purchase. It will provide training in a new occupation. If the injured person, because of limitation of finances, is not able to take a training course, the Bureau will assist him financially.

During the first ten months of its existence, the Bureau of Rehabilitation offered its services to 1,306 persons. Of these, 843 persons registered for assistance. Of these 843, more than 160, or nearly one in every five, could neither read nor write English. It is interesting to note that nearly 500 of these applicants were more than 30 years old. More than 10 per cent. of all applicants had never attended school.

Training courses opened for these injured persons include work in telegraphy, wireless telegraphy, motor mechanics, preparatory work in mechanical engineering, traffic management, salesmanship, armature winding, commercial courses, accounting, Braille reading and writing, piano tuning, carpet weaving, watch making, brazing and welding, baking and other occupations.

Sometimes it happens that the training for rehabilitation actually improves a man financially, so that he is better off after the accident than he was before. This is almost necessarily true where an unskilled workman can learn a skilled trade. For instance one man, who 57 years lost his left hand. No one would ever have believed that he could again shoe a horse. Yet the Bureau of Rehabilitation secured for him an artificial hand especially made for blacksmithing; and with this assistance he is again successfully operating a blacksmith shop.

Quite as striking, though perhaps less vital, was the restoration of a young ball-player. This was a young chap of 19 years, who lost his right leg above the knee. The Bureau helped him get a new leg, not, of course, with any idea of helping him to play any more baseball, but as a first step in fitting him for any task. The lad soon found, however, that his new leg enabled him to throw a ball almost as well as ever. Last summer he pitched twelve games on his artificial prop and won ten of them. The eleventh resulted in a nineteen-inning tie.

IN ONE sense, assisting a boy to continue in athletic sport may not be vital to his rehabilitation. In another sense it is extremely vital. One great obstacle in the way of rehabilitation is the belief of so many injured persons that their usefulness is wholly ended and that they can never again perform worth-while services. Any one who knows he can hold his own with other men in a strenuous game like baseball is not likely to lose his nerve when he goes up against the game of life.

An individual is not different from an army. And an army, as Marshal Foch said, is never beaten until it admits it is beaten. A lost leg is an insuperable obstacle or merely an incident, depending upon the mental attitude of the one injured. The psychological problem is always more important than the physiological.

It has been questioned by many whether it is proper to spend the state's money for the maintenance, including living costs and training expenses, of a disabled person in training, or for the purchase of artificial members necessary for the physically handicapped before they can again work or be trained for work.

Made almost "as good as new" since he has received an artificial leg, this young man faces life hopefully and without bitterness

This man lost both legs and his left hand was crippled, but he has been supplied with new limbs and is learning to be a telegrapher

Another man, who lost his sight and the use of his left shoulder and had his hearing impaired by an explosion in a clay mine, was sent to a school for the blind, where he was taught to weave carpets. Then the Bureau assisted him to secure a loom of his own.

Not always is it necessary to switch an injured man from one occupation to another. Wherever it is possible, such a change is avoided. A blacksmith of

The World's Christian Endeavor Convention

THE legions of young people—and they were legion, for the number of registered delegates ran well up toward the 20,000 mark, exceeding any previous record—who gathered for the Sixth World's and the Twenty-Eighth International Christian Endeavor Convention presented to New York City something far out of the ordinary in convention assemblages. For here were gathered the representatives of 4,000,000 Christian Endeavorers all over the world, with delegates in attendance from almost every land, all impelled not by motives of personal profit or pleasure, but by the ideal of service.

And the work of the convention was not confined to the huge Armory in which the main sessions were held nor to the churches and other places which housed group gatherings. The spirit of the delegates was evangelistic and daily out-door services were held by scores of teams in various parts of the city, so that every resident had an opportunity to hear the Gospel message presented with youthful enthusiasm. On Saturday there was a singing parade of 12,000 Endeavorers up Fifth Avenue, a good citizenship demonstration, which was a revelation to the many thousands of spectators in picturesqueness, color and interest.

But, after all, these were merely the more spectacular features of the convention, which was termed the world's greatest religious gathering, and it is from the inspiration and enthusiasm which the delegates will carry to all quarters of the globe as the result of the addresses at the main sessions, the devotions of the quiet hour services and the teachings of the leadership training courses that the success of the convention must be judged. And no man can attempt to judge how deep that influence will reach.

THE convention proper opened Wednesday evening, July 6, with a song and praise service led by Homer Rodeheaver. Christian Endeavorers can sing and the music at this, and at all succeeding sessions, was an inspirational feature second to none. Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of Christian Endeavor and president of the World's Christian Endeavor Union, a position to which he was re-elected, was of course the center of interest, and his message, "Christian Endeavor Four-Square," was a strong plea for the best Christian citizenship in every land.

"Forty years of Christian Endeavor history are behind us," Dr. Clark said in part.

"Our four great spheres of action are the Church, the home, the community, the world. Our four great methods are expression by prayer and testimony, service through our committees, fellowship through our unions, personal stewardship of our money, time, strength and ability. Our outside efforts are conditioned upon our relation to the Church, and derive their strength from that."

"But there are other relations which we cannot and would not forget. The home is also our sphere of action. We are all children or parents or brothers and sisters. We belong to homes. Why should not family. Christian endeavor be a vital part of our program for the years to come? Many of us may establish or help sustain family prayers, at least breakfast-table prayers, even in these busy days."

"The community and the State are our sphere of influence. We cannot escape our relation to the community and the nation. Christian Endeavor must be patriotic, but not partisan. It must take its place against the desecration of the Sabbath and of every high and holy thing."

"I should like to see a League of Endeavorers set themselves against indecent dress, sensuous, promiscuous dancing, sensual and suggestive moving pictures, all of which are destroying the modesty and eating out the souls of millions of young people. Let not Christian Endeavor be tainted by practices that lead to conformity with the world, the flesh and the devil."

The report of Edward P. Gates, general secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, told of remarkable progress, in the last two years. "Nine thousand two hundred and thirty-eight new Christian Endeavor societies have been organized in the past two years," he said. "Losses in societies and membership due to war conditions have been more than made up. There are more Christian Endeavor societies today throughout the world than ever before in the history of the movement."

THURSDAY and Friday were given over to a wide range of convention activities, with an array of notable speakers discussing topics of vital interest to the churches. More than a score of denominations also held separate conferences at which the work most important to each denomination was discussed. Social features were not overlooked; and banquets, for various groups, and sightseeing tours kept the convention visitors well occupied at hours when there were no formal sessions.

On Saturday, the main feature was the parade of 12,000 Christian Endeavorers up Fifth Avenue to Central Park, where they were joined by other thousands to listen to an address by William Jennings Bryan in which he pleaded for world disarmament and lauded President Harding's efforts to bring about an international conference. Mr. Bryan also spoke that night at the convention hall, urging opposition to the growing ravages of atheism and agnosticism in the schools. Sunday was largely devoted to worship in various churches and in the convention sessions; and the work of the convention wound up on Monday after another busy day in which "A Warless World in 1923" was selected as a slogan.

The one big disappointment of the convention was the absence of Dr. Daniel A. Poling, associate president of Christian Endeavor, who had been counted on to take an important part. Dr. Poling was injured in an automobile accident near Northampton, Mass., on the eve of the convention and spent the week in a hospital. Mrs. Poling and their three children also were injured, but all are expected to recover.

Des Moines won the 1923 convention.

CHAPTER III

By C. H. LERRIGO

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

EVERYONE was sorry about the lost boat, but it didn't affect them the way it did me. I had practically picked it up a hopeless wreck and put new life into it. I loved the "Invincible."

Kate supplied the only clue.

"I rowed over to the club-house for the milk last night," said she. "The Interurban came in just as I was coming back, and a man who got off called to know where I got his boat. I told him it was a boat that had been lying in the mud for two years and since we had salvaged it we considered it ours until someone proved a better right to it. I suppose the man watched when I went and then came and got it."

"He's a thief; that's what he is!" I declared hotly. Then, struck by a sudden idea: "Was it Persmann?"

"I don't know him," said Kate. "I wasn't here when he came to call."

"Was the man tall and stooped?"

"He was tall. I'm not sure about being stooped."

"It was Persmann, all right," I insisted. "Let's go to his place and get it back."

Kent laughed at me.

"You're just prejudiced against Persmann," he said. "After all, we had no settled claim to the boat."

"No," I burst out. "And we haven't any settled claim to anything. The boat's gone. And the canoe that really does belong, and was under the cottage, has a big hole in it. And the cottage is just a mere shack that a white person is ashamed to use for a bathhouse. And I'm tired of the whole performance. I'm going to send a telegram to my dad to send me money for the very best kind of a boat and a canoe, and to send carpenters to make this old shack over so it will look half-way respectable, and to do it mighty sudden, too."

"But, Jerry," objected Kate, "you wouldn't send such a telegram without speaking to father about it."

"Yes, I would," I insisted, "but I reckon I've got to see him first because all the money I have is seventy cents, and it won't pay for the telegram."

I FOUND the Major sitting in the sunshine in an easy-chair. He loved the light of the sun and unless it was very hot he would sit directly in its rays.

"And why do you wish to telegraph your father?" he asked.

"A lot of things, sir," I said. "Chiefly it's this place. I don't like it. The thing it needs most badly is to be pulled down and built over again from the bottom up, with new material, on an entirely different plan. It's really pretty rotten."

"That's odd!" replied the Major. "I was just thinking how well I slept last night, what a good breakfast I had this morning, and how nice and quiet it is here."

"But it's shabby, sir," I protested. "It's positively dinky. There isn't the least bit of style to it."

"I'm afraid you don't understand," said the Major. "It's Justamere Cabin."

"Oh, that's all right. I don't mind the name, but I don't want the place to look the part so much. I'm ashamed of it. Aren't you, sir?"

"No," said the Major, slowly, "I'm rather proud of it. The place just suits me. It's small, so it won't wear Mother out with housework. It's perfectly weather-tight. The paint has faded somewhat but it still gives good protection. The screens fit perfectly, so that flies and mosquitoes are excluded. It is giving splendid service to a shipwrecked family. I'm rather proud of it."

It didn't look so bad if you looked at it that way, I was bound to admit.

"It's just as you say, sir," I agreed. "I suppose I'm only a visitor, anyway. But at least I'd like to wire for money for a boat and canoe. There's no fun at a lake unless you can be in it or on it most of the time."

"Yes, Jerry, that's true enough. But, as you say yourself, you really are a visitor. Your father kindly loaned this place to me and you came as my very welcome guest. I'd be very sorry to have appeals for financial help sent to your father. It would be like a criticism of his gift, don't you see."

"Dad would not mind, from me," I urged.

"Perhaps not," said the Major, "but I would. While you are my guest I hope that you won't have to trouble your father for a single thing. I'm not a wealthy man, but I trust that I can make you happy. Now, as to the canoe. We can buy one; but how much better it will be to develop our ingenuity in making the old one fit to use."

"It has a hole in it as big as my hand," I protested.

"But that doesn't mean that you and I can't repair it. I'll boss the job and you shall do the actual work and between us we'll make that old canoe as good as new. Maybe we'll let Kent and Kate help, sometimes, if they are very good."

WELL, there's something about the Major and the way he looks at you and laughs at you that is too much for an ordinary-fellow. While he talked I really began to think it would be great fun fixing up that old canoe. The Major offered to give me some pocket money, but I told him I had plenty. Plenty! It had been a long time since I had considered seventy cents plenty.

The door opened suddenly and there stood the girl. "Take the dog away with you," she requested. "He's a good dog, but my uncle doesn't like him."

Manual work was one of the things I had enjoyed most at school, so I had no objection to tackling the canoe, although I never had worked on one before. Kent helped me put in my patch, and Kate stood around and teased.

It seemed like that canoe leaked every place. We put it in the water after my patch was in place. It leaked only the least bit around the patch, but there were a score of other places.

"I'm afraid you'll have to go over the whole job, Jerry," said the Major. "You'll have to scrape off all the old paint and find out where the canvas is bad. Then you'll have to patch the canvas. Then you will have to apply something to make it water-tight. Then you'll have to paint it. I can see a lot of fun ahead before this old canoe becomes a new one."

Someway I did not seem to care so very much even if it did need a lot of work. I had enjoyed my day, and I felt as if I could sleep all night. But before going to bed I had a little plan to put into effect. It was to meet Mr. Persmann at the Interurban, follow him to his home and see if he revealed any guilty traces of my boat.

Persmann was late coming from the city that evening. It was growing dark. This helped me in one way, for I could follow him without notice. But it was doubtful whether I would be able to see much. Another thing, I'd have to come back through the dark woods all alone. I don't want you to think that I'm afraid of the dark. I'm not, really. But if it hadn't been for the Major having said that very morning that conquering fear and fancies was a real sign of manhood I might have quit right there.

I FOLLOWED Persmann over the hill without any trouble. But when we got near the cottage that I supposed was his, I found that I had made my trip for nothing, because he might have had a dozen boats hidden around there and I could not see them in that dim light. I would have to wait until the canoe was repaired and then paddle up the creek to his boat-landing.

I noticed that the cottage was already lighted. He must have a housekeeper. It would be well for me to identify her so I could make my visit while she was away. I crept as close to the cottage as I dared. I could see no one, but I could clearly hear someone talking to Mr. Persmann. And it was not the voice of a dried-up old person, such as I had imagined would be the housekeeper. It was a young voice, young and strong and clear.

The savage bark of a dog disturbed me and I cleared out very hastily. In fact, I ran home so quickly that I had no time to see any queer shapes in the woods.

But I kept a grip upon my thought and as soon as I reached Justamere Cabin I looked for Kent.

"You said something about a boy who was in the office when your father left and might know something about the missing securities," I said. "He was a relative of Mr. Persmann's, you said. Tell me what he was like."

"What's got into you?" asked Kent. "This boy is away down South somewhere. He's a kind of a nephew of Persmann's, I think. He'd be well past sixteen now, but he was slim and undersized for his age, so probably not very big now. He wasn't a bad chap, considering."

"He'd be a lot more liable to tell the truth than his uncle would, I reckon."

"Perhaps so," Kent agreed. "Perhaps that's why Mr. Persmann left him down South."

"How d'ye know he left him down South?"

"How do you know he didn't?" replied Kent. "I've never thought much about it, but I know he went there and I haven't seen him back. Don't you let things get on your nerves. What you got into your head, anyway?"

"Maybe nothing more than usual," I said, quite mysteriously. "I'll tell you later on if it amounts to anything."

I really was a little excited about it, but I had been so active that day what with work and play that I went right off to sleep as soon as I curled up in bed and never even dreamed about it. So you can see Kent had no reason to talk about things getting on my nerves.

I GOT busy on the canoe early next day. Getting the old paint off was the first thing. Perhaps you think it was easy. I managed to improvise a scraper from an old chisel that was quite helpful, but at that it was hard work. Kent worked right along with me and he said it was hard work even for his tough muscles. Kate said it was easy, but most of her work was directing. We didn't do all the work in one day, but I was very glad when it was done.

When the old paint was scraped off we could see defects in a great many places.

"Canvas patches and pitch are what you need now," said the Major. "We have some canvas. How about pitch?"

"I can get it. There's plenty at the club-house in the basement," I replied.

I had discovered that the work-room in the basement of the club-house held a little of about everything.

Putting the pitch on was a lot more of a job than getting it, I discovered. To apply pitch to the canvas of a canoe in proper fashion you must first make it hot. Hot! It must be boiling! It must be a liquid that will brush easily and freely on the surface. This sounds simple enough until you try it.

Mrs. Bassel supplied a big iron skillet and Kent built a fire down near the dock where we were doing our work. He showed me how to build up a small, concentrated fire that would give out a lot of heat. It was not very long until we have a fire hot enough to cook hippopotamus steaks.

The Prize-Fight

THE Minister, the Ultimate Consumer, the Young Man Around Town, the Old Timer, and the Business Man were having a little talk together over current news, and finally the Young Man around Town said.

"That was a great fight, wasn't it?"

"Wonder why so many people are so much interested in a prize-fight?" said the Minister.

"I don't mind saying I got up early Sunday morning on purpose to get my paper to read the whole account before I went to church," said the Business Man.

"I spent the whole time the fight was going on, down in front of the newspaper bulletin board, getting the returns blow by blow," said the Old Timer.

"I wanted to go on and see the fight, but I couldn't afford the price," said the Ultimate Consumer sadly. "It must have been a great sight."

"Still, I don't see why such a great fuss was made for weeks in the daily papers over a prize-fight. More space was given to it than to events of international importance, and for days we read personal contributions made by each fighter in which he said he was sure of beating his opponent," said the Minister.

"You must have been interested enough in the fight to read the newspaper accounts of it," said the Young Man Around Town. "I shouldn't wonder if you read the Sunday morning paper account of it, same as the Business Man did, before you went to church."

"I shouldn't wonder," said the Minister frankly. "At the same time I don't know just why so much importance was attached to a prize-fight as the papers and the public gave it. It raises the question, 'Are we civilized after all?'"

"Of course we are civilized," said the Business Man, "but we are all of us more or less interested in the primitive passions. That is shown by the long time we have been at war. The best of us is only a short ways from the old savage. We still like to see two strong men fight."

"And thousands of people in all ranks of life, including governors of states, are willing to pay big money to see two men pound each other," said the Ultimate Consumer.

"The secret of it all," said the Old Timer, "lies in the enjoyment of seeing scientific sport."

"Same as the old Romans enjoyed when they sat down in the arena to watch men fight to kill one another in the gladiatorial shows," said the Minister.

"Yes, if those shows were revived, and allowed like this prize-fight, half the population of the United States would pay twenty dollars apiece to see them," said the Young Man Around Town. "I would for one."

"I wonder how far we are civilized?" murmured the Minister.

"I can't see much difference myself between the brutality and savagery of a prize-fight and the voting of $500,000,000 of the people's money to get ready to fight other nations," said Ultimate Consumer. "If we are going to compare the prize-fight with the war spirit of what we call civilized peoples, I say let's give the prize for civilization to the prize-fighters, because even if they are killed, there are only two men gone, whereas a $500,000,000 making of deadly warships means the possible killing of thousands of precious lives."

"It is a question how far we are civilized, isn't it?" said the Minister. "We still enjoy prize-fights and war."

"But they come high," said Ultimate Consumer with a sigh. "I couldn't raise the price to see the fight."

"But you have to pay the price to keep up war," said the Minister.

"Whether I want to or not," said Ultimate Consumer with a sigh. "I don't believe we are very civilized after all." C. M. S.

The Wet Parade

IT IS just as well to get a partisan view of the much-advertised "Personal Liberty" parade in New York City on July 4th, when the promoters assured the country that 200,000 people would march up Fifth Avenue and demand their beer. The New York World, foremost among "wet" newspapers, said on July 5th:

"It was not any 'early morning till late night' affair, such as had been promised. Of the 202,670 men and women who signed pledges that they would march, not one-tenth appeared. (The official count showed less than 15,000 in line, including police and nearly 1,000 musicians.) And of those who did take part, eight out of every ten—so far as the World's observer could judge—were foreign born. And looking at it in yet another way, eight of every ten were middle-aged."

"New Yorkers lost their liquor without any particularly determined fight, and they haven't shown many signs of fighting to get it back."

The World, admitting thus frankly a lack of support, still struggles on in its efforts to restore what obviously New Yorkers do not want restored.

"The world, the flesh and the devil do a lot of advertising in these days. It seems to pay this iniquitous combination pretty well. Should the Church be less anxious to speak strongly and winsomely to the community?"—Bishop Joseph F. Berry, Chairman Committee on Conservation and Advance, M. E. Church.

After Peace—What?

THE glorious "Fourth" of 1921 deserves to be enshrined in history. Our country, two days before, by Congressional resolution and Presidential signature, had been declared once again on a peace basis. The long-continued state of war against Germany was ended. Little wonder that in the celebration of the Fourth there was a new note of thankfulness and an added element of jubilation. Orators gave vivid expression to the fact, and pulpit and platform hailed it as the harbinger of future friendly international relationships, renewed commercial intercourse and better times all around.

But peace, if we are to reap its benefits, must be followed by measures giving a basis for the establishment of a better understanding. The peace resolution is simply the forerunner, not the thing itself. Our Allies know this; the President knows it, and so also does Secretary Hughes. There are treaties of commerce and good-will to be made, before even the first-fruits of peace can be harvested.

Here the inevitable question arises: What of the Treaty of Versailles? Will it be accepted and ratified, possibly with modifications? This, if we may judge of the former propositions for its ratification, is clearly debatable ground. Are we to witness another interminable wrangle on this point, or will calmer judgments prevail and the Senate fall in line with President Harding's desire "to engage under the existing treaty?"

Let us hope that the best interests of the whole people will not be sacrificed, and that wisdom and tolerance will guide the coming discussions. The country has become impatient of partisanship that should have no place in the great task that lies before Congress, now that the way is open for the solution of so many questions affecting national and international well-being.

Some 91,000 people paid $1,631,380 to see two pugilists fight in Jersey City for ten minutes and sixteen seconds. Just as a matter of comparison, this sum would pay an average salary to more than 2,000 ministers of the Gospel for a whole year.

By Their Fruits

MR. BRYAN'S article, "Tampering with the Mainspring," was criticized by several readers, but one of the main points he made ought to make people generally do some serious thinking.

It is always a fair inference to make when a certain kind of philosophical teaching results in creating a spirit of doubt concerning religious verities, or the Gospel of the Heart as Jesus taught it. A teaching in the college which first undermines the student's faith and then leaves him nothing in the place of the doubt created, is a teaching which deserves to be condemned.

The following confession on the part of one student in a large college, at the close of his college course does not admit of discussion except the discussion on the part of the college trustees or authorities as to the quickest way to secure another teacher in the department of philosophy. The student says in brief:

"Here I am a graduate after four years' study. I majored in philosophy and sociology. I find that my faith in the Bible teaching has been removed. I do not know what I believe about Jesus Christ. I am not sure that He ever did any miracles. I am not at all sure that there is any such thing as immortality. My teachers both in philosophy and sociology bore down heavy on scientific facts. Everything must be proved in order to be believed—that is, proved scientifically. Miracles, they taught me, were a part of the superstition of the times. In short, I am left without any definite belief in Christ, and in doubt as to what are the essential things in religion. And my condition is that of all my classmates, with a few exceptions. We are out of college, and we are also out of our father's and mother's old Gospel faith. We do not have theirs and we have none of our own."

This is a startling confession from a young man representing, as he believes, hundreds of others.

There is something wrong, fatally wrong, with any teaching which leaves a young mind in such a state of doubt concerning religion.

Is this one reason why so few young men are choosing the ministry? Is this the reason why a college like Amherst, out of a large class, had only one candidate for the Church? Is not Mr. Bryan right in one of his points at least, that there is somewhere a tampering with the mainspring? If the teaching of a certain type of philosophy is not to blame for the apathy and religious indifference of young college men, what is the matter? If the Mainspring is being tampered with, who is doing the tampering?

Saving the Children

ONE of the largest problems which the Church has yet to solve is the winning of the children.

While a pastor may be able and eloquent, and "a power in the pulpit," yet if, when occasion offers, he can not win the attention and the confidence of the little folks, he will soon find that his usefulness in the Gospel vineyard is strictly limited. The late Dr. Spurgeon sedulously cultivated the art of both speaking and writing on such simple lines that the young folks were readily won. Bishop William Taylor used to say that if he could win the little children of Africa, he could foresee the whole of the Dark Continent won for Christ.

The Rev. James McNeill Farrar, who passed away a short time ago, was an intense lover of children. He probably did more in his lifetime, and especially during his twenty-six years' ministry in the First Reformed Church of Brooklyn, towards spreading the Gospel among young hearts of that city, than any other clergyman in the state. Like the late Dr. Klopsch, the founder of Mont-Lawn and formerly owner of the Christian Herald, Dr. Farrar regarded the special training of the little ones as of supreme importance. He seemed to have adopted as the motto of his ministry, "Come, let us live for the Children," and to emphasize the language of Jesus when He said of them: "For of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

Nearly thirty years have passed since Dr. Farrar laid the foundations of the Junior Congregation Movement. It was a success from the outset, because it was conducted by loving lips and an earnest heart that understood childhood. In his church program he planned a branch composed exclusively of children, not merely members of his Sunday school, but others who might be attracted; and to this youthful audience he preached a Children's Sermon regularly every Sunday morning before the usual service. These Child Sermons were simplicity itself and drew ever-increasing audiences. So simple and effective were they that they attracted even the grown-up folks.

Dr. Farrar was 68 years old when he went to his reward, but the work accomplished by his ministry was enormous and far-reaching. It seemed as though all the love of his heart was poured out in the sermons he prepared with such care and diligence for the young. For several years these sermons appeared regularly in the columns of the Christian Herald, and we know that they were widely read. On many occasions the pastor was a welcome visitor at Mont-Lawn, and the child audience as well as the bigger folks crowded the Temple and listened with delight to the man whose wonderful gift of reaching the child heart and consciousness had made him so widely loved. Great is the world's need of more such men—men who can kindle the spiritual fire in the hearts of the young, and win them to Christ before they begin the real struggle of life, with all its temptations and its perils.

A pastor who can win the children is a power for the in-bringing of the Kingdom. Not every one can do this for it is a rare gift and one to be sacredly cherished and developed. Often have we heard ministers lament the difficulty of dealing with child audiences. Why should this field be neglected? The preacher who wins the children will in most cases find that these young natures are wonderful allies, who in their own sweet, simple way, can bring in the parents.

Harding Proposes Conference of Five Nations on Disarmament

THAT President Harding has approached Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan with informal but definite inquiries to ascertain whether they favor the holding of a disarmament conference has been announced by the American State Department. If the proposal is found to be acceptable, formal invitations for such a conference in Washington will be issued. It is notable that the proposed conference will not be limited to naval disarmament, as was suggested in the measure so long considered by Congress, but also may take up the question of reducing armaments on land and other problems.

China also has been invited to take part in the discussion relating to Far Eastern problems, it was announced, giving to the gathering a scope broader than that of mere disarmament. Of this, the State Department statement said: "It is manifest that the question of limitation of armament has a close relation to the Pacific and Far Eastern problems, and the President has suggested that the Powers especially interested in these problems should undertake in connection with this conference the consideration of all matters bearing upon their solution with a view to reaching a common understanding with respect to principles and policies in the Far East."

The American statement was greeted enthusiastically in Great Britain, and it was predicted both in America and abroad that the Powers would return replies which would permit President Harding to issue the call for the conference. The wide range of subjects to be considered would make it in essence a world conference and it was suggested that out of it there is bound to grow a discussion of the formation of an international association to prevent future wars, into which the United States would feel free to enter.

Truce in Ireland Declared

THE declaration of truce between the Crown and the Irish Republican forces followed speedily the announcement of Eamonn de Valera's decision to meet Premier Lloyd George in London to discuss the basis on which a peace conference might be held. Terms of the truce were agreed upon by the British military commander in Ireland and representatives of the Irish Republican army, and became effective at noon on Monday, July 11. On the eve of its going into effect there was a serious outbreak of rioting in Belfast in which fifteen persons were killed and nearly a hundred injured, but it was hoped the leaders of the opposing forces would be able to hold their men in line and that Ireland would enjoy an interval of quiet while the peace parleys are in progress.

Mr. de Valera's decision was preceded by conferences in Dublin between Republican and Unionist leaders of Southern Ireland in which it was announced "certain agreements were come to," a statement which brought great demonstrations of rejoicing despite its indefinite character. An important factor in the parleys was General Jan Christian Smuts, Premier of the Union of South Africa, who went to Dublin on his own initiative, but undoubtedly with the approval of Lloyd George, for conversations with de Valera and other Irish leaders.

The road to permanent peace in Ireland still is long and difficult, but a good start has been made and hopes for an Irish settlement are brighter than at any time in recent history.

Fight Made on Bonus Bill

THE Soldiers' Bonus bill, which would add anywhere from $1,500,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 to the public debt, has encountered strong opposition in the Senate because of the state of the nation's finances and the campaign to reduce federal expenditures. Advocates of the bonus were predicting its speedy passage after the Senate had voted, 46 to 4, to take up the measure, but their confidence vanished as it became apparent that the vote did not reflect the views of the Senators on bonus legislation, and as President Harding and Secretary Mellon counselled delay.

The President, in a call at the Capitol, made it plain that while he was committed to legislation to compensate the veterans of the World War, he believed it advisable to defer action. It was expected he would send a special message to Congress setting forth his views on the problem, and Senatorial leaders predicted his wishes would be followed.

Secretary Mellon, in a letter to Senator Frelinghuysen, urged that action of the bonus be deferred since its passage would "greatly swell the cost of government and virtually defeat the Administration's program of economy and retrenchment."

THE GREAT WORLD'S CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CONVENTION IN SESSION

The main gatherings, of which this is one, were held in the Seventy-First Regiment Armory, New York City, but many group meetings were held in near-by churches and all were enthusiastic and inspirational

The Fordney general tariff bill has been engrossing all the attention of the House, but the stage has been set for rushing it through and the House Republicans have fixed July 21 as the date for a final vote, which means only two weeks of general consideration. The rules adopted put a five-minute limit on speeches after July 14 and permitted the offering of amendments only on the hides, dyes, cotton, oil and asphalt sections, all other schedules to be subject only to amendment only by the Ways and Means Committee.

The seven Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, which framed the bill, presented a minority report bitterly attacking its provisions.

It was anticipated that the bill would not be ready for the President's signature for several weeks, as the Senate will seek to make many changes in the measure. It was proposed that the Senate should adjourn for three or four weeks, while the House was working on tariff and tax revision bills, but this proposal, which was supported by the floor leaders of both parties, was defeated by an agricultural bloc which demanded that action be hastened on measures to afford relief to the farmers.

AND STILL A SICK WORLD KEEPS ITSELF "BROKE" BUYING HIS PRESCRIPTIONS

The deadlock on the Naval Appropriation bill continued, each chamber rejecting amendments desired by the other, and another weary round of conferences was necessary, while the Navy Department remained technically without funds.

"Wet" Parade a Failure

OPPONENTS of national prohibition made great plans for their parade up Fifth Avenue in New York City on July 4 in protest against the Volstead Act and the Eighteenth Amendment. It was to be a tremendous demonstration of anti-prohibition sentiment which would frighten the nation's lawmakers into "liberal" modifications of the statutes, and officers of the American Liberties League, which sponsored it, predicted in advance that the marchers would number hundreds of thousands.

Even the New York newspapers most hostile to prohibition admitted that the parade was a failure and ridiculed the claims of the promoters that 50,000 to 75,000 were in line. The Anti-Saloon League engaged an audit company to make an exact count and its figure was 14,922, including 922 musicians and 24 policemen.

The police inspector in charge of the policing arrangements, with years of experience in parades, estimated that only 8,000 took part.

Some of the banners carried by the marchers elicited manifestations of disapproval from spectators along the route. Particularly was this the case with regard to a copy of da Vinci's famous painting "The Last Supper" which bore the legend "Wine was served," and hisses greeted such a use of a picture which many consider sacred. Many also objected to the display of Bible texts to bolster up such a cause.

All in all, the wets made a poor showing and their much-heralded effort proved to be a boomerang.

France Recalls Leipsic Mission

CHARGING that the German trials of Germans accused of war crimes are a mockery, the French Government has recalled its mission to the Leipsic court. It notified the Allies of its action, and was expected to follow this with a request that the Allies return to the Treaty plan and demand that Germany hand over at least a few of the accused men for trial by an Allied tribunal.

The case which most stirred French indignation was that of Lieutenant General Karl Stenger, accused of having given orders to his troops that no prisoners should be taken and that the wounded should be killed. The general was acquitted. Major Bruno Cresius, his subordinate, received a sentence of two years in prison after being convicted on similar charges and having testified that the general gave such orders. Trials on charges by the British and Belgian Governments have resulted in acquittals or light sentences.

TWO WARSHIPS ORDERED TO TAMPICO. United States cruiser Cleveland and the gunboat Sacramento have been sent to Tampico, the most important oil-shipping port on Mexico's eastern coast, to protect American interests because of threatened labor troubles. President Obregon denied the Tampico situation was serious and attributed the unrest to the efforts of the oil companies to force the Mexican Government to lower the oil tax.

RAILROAD MEN TO VOTE ON WAGE CUT. Acceptance or rejection of the 12 per cent. wage cut made effective on July 1 by order of the United States Railroad Labor Board will be determined by a referendum vote of the members of the five train service brotherhoods not later than September 1. Other railroad unions probably will take similar ballots.

NEW ITALIAN CABINET FORMED. Ivanoe Bonomi has organized a new cabinet in Italy to succeed the Giolitti ministry, distributing the portfolios among the parties of the Center to the exclusion of the Extreme Lefts and Rightists.

GENERAL DU PONT NAMED SENATOR. General T. Coleman du Pont has been appointed United States Senator from Delaware to succeed Josiah O. Wolcott, who resigned to become Chancellor of Delaware.

The Younger Boy Problem Again

IF THERE is anything I have always despised in a business man it has been deceit of any kind, misrepresentation of goods or exaggeration in advertising so as to throw a would-be buyer off his guard, or little tricks of evasion that skim the edges of the exact truth.

So it came to me with a good deal of keenness of feeling that my own boy had been guilty of deception in the matter of his Sunday-school attendance, especially as he had recently had one lesson in the matter of the movies. And I confess to a real rising of anger as the boy confronted me in my "den," and I did not feel kindly towards him. He shrank back as I put the question to him bluntly: "How long have you been deceiving your mother and me about this Sunday-school business?"

"Not very long."

"You have been deceiving us, then?"

"Yes, sir."

"This isn't the first time?"

"No."

"Have you any excuse?"

"Not any you would accept."

"Don't you know that one of the worst habits a boy can acquire is to lie to his father and mother?"

The boy did not answer this, only looked sullenly down at the floor, and shuffled his feet uneasily.

"Don't you?" I said with a rising inflection.

"Yes, sir."

"Don't you know that a habit like that is likely to fasten itself on you until no one will put any confidence in you, and it will ruin your chances for success?"

HE DID not reply to that, and I paused a moment. The boy looked very miserable and unhappy, and I began to wonder if I had really found out the reason for his deception.

"You said you had no reason for deception that I would accept. Give me any reason you may have for deceiving your mother and me."

He hesitated and I said, a little more gently: "Well, go on. It may be no reason, but I want to give you a chance to say what is on your mind."

"Well, my teacher is an old poke. He doesn't know how to make the lessons interesting. And there is so much confusion and cutting up that I don't get anything out of going to Sunday school."

"What kind of a superintendent have you got, if he can't keep order and get teachers who are interesting?"

"I don't know anything about that," the boy said sullenly, lapsing into his semi-defiant attitude. "All I know is that I hate going to Sunday school."

"But you know you ought to go, don't you?"

"I don't know why," he said, suddenly looking up.

"Why! Everyone ought to go. Where can you ever get a knowledge of the Bible, if you don't go?"

And the minute I said it, I knew I had made an opening for the boy. Sure enough he came back at me as quick as a flash with the retort, "Why don't you go, then?"

NOW you may remember, if you read the first of these confessions of A Mere Man, that I stated as one of the facts about our family that we all belonged to the church and Sunday school. That statement should have been modified a little. I ought to have gone on to say that while we all did belong to the church and Sunday school it did not mean, on my part, at least, the loyalty and devotion that church members ought to show to the institution that the Master loved and for which He gave Himself up. And after belonging to a men's Bible Class in our church for several years I had dropped out because of some small annoyance from a chronic talker who irritated me, and for some time I had established a custom of staying at home Sunday mornings while my wife and children represented the family at Sunday school.

My wife did not approve of my habit, but one of her characteristics has been what I myself think at times is a too strong habit of deference to her husband. She can be as positive as any one could desire when it comes to obeying convictions of her own, but she has always hesitated to enforce them on me, and there have been times when I have wished she had. It came over me with a feeling of self-reproach right at this moment that if she had insisted on my keeping my church vows as I had promised, it would have saved me from a most embarrassing situation with the boy.

He was looking at me closely, and watching the effect of his question, and the best thing I could think of saying was:

"That has nothing to do with your deception. You have been lying—that is the real word to use—to us, and the excuse you give, is, as you said, not any that I can accept. I want to talk this over with your mother. And

Continuing the Discussion of the Question of Sunday-School Attendance

By A MERE MAN

I want you to think over the whole matter seriously. It is too bad that the Sunday school is not more interesting. But that has nothing to do with your deception. You should have come to your mother or to me and told us about your dislike for your teacher and all the rest. Those things can be changed. But a habit of lying is so serious that it cannot be treated lightly. You can go now. But—"

To tell the truth the question the boy had put to me about my own absence from Sunday school had rather upset me, and made difficult any discipline I might have wished to give him in a dignified and self-respecting manner.

HE WENT away without any sign of repentance on his sullen face, and I talked the matter over later in the day while the children were out of the house.

"Of course, John," my wife said when I related the

Summer Afternoon

By Margaret E. Sangster

LEAF shadows fall across the grass,
Like happy little wraiths at play—
There is no past, no yesterday,
And no tomorrow; hours pass
Like dim forms in a looking-glass,
Near sounds seem strangely far away;
A smoke-like haze hangs, thin and gray,
Where mountains make a purple mass.

The sun is flaming in the sky,
A drowsy ball of molten fire—
The wind sings, like a fairy lyre,
But softly as a lullaby,
Life drifts—and does not question why—
With deep content, and no desire!

facts of my interview with the boy, "we did take a vow when we joined the church that we would support all the church services and the Sunday school was mentioned particularly. And I have wished many times that you had kept on with your Bible Class. The teachers are not perfect, but the Sunday school as a whole is a wonderful help, and if you had only—"

That was as near as she usually came to a reproach for any of my shortcomings, and I felt the attack made by the boy so keenly that I blurted out, "If I had only kept my word, perhaps the boy would not have deceived us."

"Kept your word!" my wife said, as if shocked.

"But I did not mean—"

"No, I know you didn't. But don't you remember when we joined the church, as you say, we made a vow to support it by attending its services. Strictly speaking I have not kept my word made to the minister and the church when I joined. And as I think it over, the boy has a pretty good case against his father, so far as deceit is concerned. For I begin to think I have deceived my minister and the church and have not very much to boast about to the boy."

"But I don't know a man anywhere who has a higher standard for truth and honesty in business. Why, John—"

"It may be I have in business. But do you know, it seems a little queer, but I begin to think that a man's word given to his minister and his church does not mean the same as his word given to a business acquaintance. At any rate, I can not stand it to let the boy get ahead of me in this matter and I think I had better keep my word made to attend the services of the church, and get back to Sunday school."

You should have seen the look on my wife's face when I came out strong on that decision. It is a wonder to me that I don't oftener do things that please her, just to get the benefit of a look that is just glorified happiness. We talked the matter of the boy's deception over at length but did not arrive at any definite decision as to the right way to punish him for it, only I made clear to my wife that I felt as guilty as he in a certain sense and the first thing for me to do was to set myself right with my own convictions.

SO WHEN next Sunday came, I said at the breakfast table so that all could hear, "We will all get ready for Sunday school this morning, and go down together."

No one said anything, but the boy looked rather queer. He made no objection and we all walked down. We live out in the college district, and the church is a down-town church, about a quarter of a mile from our house.

When we went in, the Superintendent was at the door welcoming people and he seemed unusually glad to see me. I went and sat down by one of my business friends who had gone in just ahead of me, and the rest of the family went to their different department rooms.

Pretty soon the Superintendent came to me and said, with some hesitation: "I feel awfully glad to see you here. Do you think you could take a class this morning? One of my teachers is not able to be here. It's a class of boys and they need just such a man as you to hold them."

I was all taken back and all I could say was, "Oh, no. I am not prepared to teach. I don't know the lesson."

"Well, we have a graded school, you know, and you can take the general theme that is being discussed in that department, which comes right in your line of business. It deals with the question of socializing business, and you are just the person to tell those boys what you are doing. And by the way, your own boy is in that class. He hasn't been here for the last two Sundays. Glad to see him come in today. Oh, I wish you would take that class! It has caused me great trouble. The boys are not bad, but they are alive and ought to have the best teacher in the church."

I DON'T know to this day what made me decide as I did. I think it was partly because I have always hated a coward. And also I think it was because I was still feeling keenly the self-reproach of breaking my word.

At any rate I made up my mind I would try to get hold of that class of boys, and it was partly curiosity to see what the problem was, together with all the rest, that made me say "yes" to the Superintendent.

I haven't time to tell you all my experience that Sunday morning. My firm in the city for which I have worked several years was right in the midst of some very interesting experiments in trying to help the employees to better ideals of home life. I was really interested in the plan and knew enough about it to hold those boys' attention while I told them some of the ways the thing worked out. Perhaps it was partly because they had a new voice, and partly because I do have some good quality for teaching that they behaved all through the school hour so well that after the session the Superintendent came over and said: "Say, I wish you could take that class right along. Can't you?"

I did not promise him at the time, but it would take another account to tell the story of how I finally did take the class and have it yet, and I have become deeply interested in the Sunday school and its plans. But before that time came along, I must say that when we came home and after we were seated at the dinner table, the Girl said, "Father, I wish you would teach our class. I heard great things about your teaching this morning."

I actually blushed. Some of it for pleasure, some for remorse. My wife looked her best. The older boy never said anything, and the younger one said, speaking very low, "I wouldn't mind going to Sunday school if father would teach."

He did not say it to me, but to his mother. She seemed to choke over something, although we were not having fish or chicken for dinner.

BUT only last Sunday as I sat teaching that class in our Sunday school, I caught myself holding my breath as I met that look in my younger son's eye, fixed on his father. It seemed to me that in that look he asked forgiveness for his deceit, which was by this time several weeks old. And when I went home, that afternoon as my wife and I were alone in the "den" a few minutes I said to her, "We have never punished the lad for his deception in not attending Sunday school."

"I have been praying we might have wisdom to do what was wise," she said.

"And I am inclined to think, my dear," I said "that your prayers have been answered."

And we are leaving the matter right there. I may as well say that I am trying to do my part as a good father ought, making many mistakes as I go along. But when it comes to the prayers of my wife for the children, I cannot help thinking, after all, that the wisdom which is from above is far above our wisdom and our foolishness.

Building Up the Kingdom

A Sermon by Dr. CHARLES M. SHELDON

TEXT—Matt. 28: 19. "Go ye into all the world and make disciples of the nations."

THE program of the Kingdom of God is exceedingly clear and definite. It is in keeping with the fact that its great Leader is the Light of the World. There was no vagueness or uncertainty in His own thought of the needs of humanity, and He made His own teaching so plain and simple, so well founded upon eternal principles that are true of all sorts and conditions of men, that His disciples need not for one moment have any hesitation concerning what the business of Christianity is.

The splendid dogmatism of Christ is the glad heritage of His disciples. It is a fine thing to belong to an institution like the Kingdom of God, which knows what it is doing and why, which does not start with question marks of doubt, but with exclamation points of conviction. The glory of the Christian life has always been the presence of that conscious power which takes for granted a large number of hard questions definitely answered, a great many battles fought and won, and a vast amount of philosophy simplified into the most workable precepts. So all the missionary enterprises of Christendom, wherever they have been truly great and forceful, have taken their beginning from the fact of positive certainty that Christ was the answer, not only to the individual need, but to the social structure of life and to the world as a whole.

Racial differences are not by any means an insurmountable obstacle to the Christian brotherhood. There is no barrier which genuine Christian love of man for men cannot overcome. Race prejudice certainly is not such a tremendous thing that it need of necessity separate the people of a nation into two hostile camps or even in two separate and critical collections of people belonging nominally to the same community, but really existing apart. If all the Negroes in the South were Booker Washingtons, and all the white men in the South were John Greenleaf Whittiers there would be no race question any more.

We simply come back at the last analysis to the place where Christ wishes us to begin. Perfect love casteth out fear. All of us are brothers. If a man is a real Christian, not a nominal one, he cannot create trouble for his brother. And all the races of the universe could subsist in a happy family, within the compass of a republic far smaller geographically than ours, if once their hearts were right in the sight of God and towards one another.

THE word "missions" covers the entire activity of one man's soul for the good of another, whether it is in China or in Wall Street. But our churches are many of them dead to this great fact, and the missionary enthusiasm has no divine impulse at the heart. The thing is lacking sometimes because of lack of information, oftener because of lack of genuine Christian life. But there is always hope in the young. The finest thing that any pastor of any church can do is to gather his young people about him, beginning with the children in his Sunday school, and tell them the story of missionary effort around the world, making a beginning of a class, even though it is only a small number, and teaching the absolute necessity for the church life to center about the missionary spirit.

Out of a great many of our churches has gone the presence of the ideal. We are so afraid of looking into the future for the greatest possibilities that we fail to do the plain and practical things of the present. When Emerson said, "Hitch your wagon to a star," he might have added, "and then get into the wagon." A good many of us hitch our wagons to stars and then stand off and look at them, and in the life of the church in the world the absence of a spiritual imagination which sees the possibility of great things actually done in the earth is keeping many a pastor and his people back in the place of the dull routine of habit, of custom and of commonplace.

One reason we are here, I take it, is to attempt the ideal in our earthly existence. The very statement of the program of the Kingdom of God includes of necessity this ideal rule of life. Certainly no man ever faced more discouraging conditions than did Jesus Christ, yet He wanted to hasten the millennium to such an extent that He did not hesitate to tell His disciples to be as perfect as God. There is more in that phrase, "Make disciples of the nations," than the church has so far grasped in its large and inclusive meaning.

Making disciples of the nations that belong to the United States means more than making Republicans or Democrats, or Socialists, or Prohibitionists out of them. It means more than making good farmers, carpenters, mechanics out of them. It means even more than making out of them men who respect the United States Government and obey to a large extent its laws. It means even more than making out of these different races loyal citizens who even go so far as to love the country, and if need be, die for it. Making disciples of the nations means transforming the life out of this world character into the other world. It means putting the stamp of Christ's inward personality into His motive and purpose in living, upon everyone of these races.

THE Kingdom of God is gigantic in the unfolding of its purpose, and it is well for us who belong to the church of Christ at the present time to consider whether it is in all particulars fit to bear the message of the Master, to these alien people unless its own life is more richly filled with the spirit of real discipleship. I was talking with a refined and cultured foreigner, whom some people in America would call heathen, and he said frankly: "Why should I change my religion, into which I was born, for yours? When I look at the fruits of it in your churches, I do not see enough difference to make me willing to exchange many things which are dear to me in the religion of my father for what you call Christian. I find," he ministry of the near future will consist in that kind of service, where a man is willing to sink his ambitions for the reputation of being a great preacher and enter upon the less renowned but more fundamental work of teaching the people the great things which are fundamental to the building up of the Kingdom of God in a parish. Not one minister in a thousand has any oratorical gifts to start with. Every one of the thousand, if he is at all fit to be in the ministry, could, however, be a teacher of the Word, and our pulpits in America are suffering today from lack of real teachers more than from any other one thing.

THE task before us seems gigantic! It is no less than the attempt to take an unformed, ignorant, sinful, in some cases, debauched and degraded, humanity of different tongues and races, ancestry and training, and shape it all over into refined, enthusiastic, useful, pure, enlightened Christian discipleship, to make strong the welfare of the republic, to love God and man with eagerness, in other words, to become through and through Christlike. Compared with the attempt to make artisans, or farmers, or musicians or politicians out of the material which comes to us from every climate, the work is simply superhuman, and it would be impossible if it were not for this constant fact of the authority and power of Him who bids us do it. "All authority," He says "has been given unto Me." But in another place we have the assurance that this authority belongs to us: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," and it is in the divine assurance that this same power which the Master claimed for Himself is also ours with Him, that we undertake the glorious work of changing men's lives, for the good of the republic and the greater good of the world.

The Kingdom of God is not a vague thing. It is the most real of all things because it is something within us. We are not certain of the outward and the physical things. They are constantly changing. The old textbooks that once told me that air was a viewless gas are not printed any more, not since the professor began to throw liquid air around like snowballs; but the things of the inner life all remain the same. They are the reality of existence, and the Kingdom of God is within us. It is that kingdom within men which we are to establish here on the earth.

It is more than statecraft of men to build up this Kingdom. Strange as it may seem, the republic of the United States cannot endure without the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ. But give us the Kingdom within the hearts of these people and we may be sure of the endurance of the republic. Let us go, therefore, with knowledge of what it means to all the different races within our great land and make disciples of them, realizing that it means more than surface emotion stirred through some religious excitement, that it means complete transformation and renewal and rebirth of the entire nature, including purposes, motives, passions, conduct, at the heart of all of which there is found resident the regnant and loving Christ of God. And let us pray also that our churches may receive such a baptism from the Spirit of God that they may realize what has been done even with imperfect and weak hands of men, where it has been done out of love for Him, and with added knowledge and with growing enthusiasm may it carry on the work which shall eventually, we believe, transform the things which make for wrongs and prejudices and race hatred into a harmony of living hearts of men that have but one real passion and one real love, summed up in the great desire that the Kingdom of God might come and His will be done on earth even as it is in Heaven. "And lo," He says, "I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

GREAT BRITAIN'S drink bill now amounts to 430,000,000 pounds a year, or at the normal rate of exchange, about $2,150,000,000. While liquor is costing Great Britain more than two billion dollars a year, prohibition is saving the United States practically the same amount; an economic advantage to this country of more than $4,000,000,000 every twelve months. How long can the British people compete in the world's market while laboring under such a staggering handicap? A few strong men in England are awake to the dangers of the situation. They are finding that drink affects the earning power of nations as it affects the earning power of men, and they foresee the effect on international commerce of the $2,000,000,000 the United States now can put into legitimate business that formerly passed to brewers and distillers. They are for British prohibition for selfish, if for no other reasons, and they are making a good fight for it.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"The Shining Shore" or "Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Philippians 3: 13-21. "Confidence in Christ."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 522, first column).

Sermon—"BUILDING UP THE KINGDOM"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feelled to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Crown Him Lord of All" or "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Saviour."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Dismiss us now, we ask of Thee, into a wider service, a happier day's work, a more trustful heart, a deeper hunger for the right and a faith that rises above small and great losses. We ask it in the Name of Him who never lost his belief in man, our Saviour and Redeemer, Jesus Christ. AMEN.

said, "very many of your church members are men who seem to be engrossed in the things of the world. They talk, 'money, money, money' all the time. They live extravagantly." He cited particular instances.

I was in a Methodist church in Northern Michigan a few years ago, where the membership was made up almost entirely of Cornishmen, miners in the iron mines. The young Methodist preacher had just been called to the place from another locality where, evidently from his remarks, the people were not in the habit of going to church. As we sat behind the pulpit waiting for the service, and my young brother noted the streams of men coming into the building, he leaned over and whispered to me, saying, "It beats everything how these people up here go to church. They go to church in spite of everything I can do." Learning afterward something concerning this brother's pulpit ministrations, it added force to his remark, for the people were in the habit of attending church for public worship, and the preaching was not the greatest thing which drew them there.

Some of the rank and file of our church membership is composed of real Christian disciples, and in spite of everything the pastor can do or not do, they will find out something about the work of the Kingdom of God. As a rule, however, the old adage, "Like priest, like people," holds, and it is the great privilege of the minister to lead his people.

We of the pulpit are very often tempted to prepare too many great sermons, where as three-fourths of our pulpit ministrations should be in the nature of teaching our people about the Kingdom in a quiet and unobtrusive, and I would like to say unoratorical, way. I would like to predict that the most successful future

Running the Straight Race

SUNDAY. Heb. 12:1, 2. "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus." That is the counsel of an expert runner, a man who has been on the Christian course for many years. What he has to say about the character of the going, and the secret of progress, is worth our most eager attention. The counsels are not the creation of a secluded theorist, they are the findings of long and hard experience.

Well, then I will note, first of all, the intensity of his figure of speech. It is a race. The Christian life is a running. It is, therefore, the very opposite to loitering. It has nothing in common with sauntering, or with dilly-dallying, or with a careless, aimless walking about the streets, which permits us to stop and look into every shop window. On the way of life we are to run. We are to put some speed into it. We are to put some steam into it. Our safety is to be found in pace.

The psalmist was getting near the secret when he purposed to "run in the way of God's commandment." To walk loiteringly in the way of the commandments is, in a certain manner, not to be in the way at all. Life, which moves to obedience with reluctance, and is continually standing still to look back, is inviting all sorts of enemies, and it is exposed to successful attacks on every side. To run is to be secure. "Ye did run well!" That was the day of athletic spiritual health, and their defences were complete.

There is another thing to be said about running. It is less tiring than loitering. Is there anything more exhausting than just hanging about? And this is as true in the ways of religion as in the streets of the city. People who hang about in the ways of Zion can never excel in strength. On these roads the lackadaisical are the degenerates. It is the folk with "go" in their religion who go from strength to strength. They run and are not weary. So I must put speed into the King's business, and I shall find security in my enthusiasm.

But now the expert counsellor adds a qualifying, or shall we say, an enriching word. We are to run the race "with patience." That is a very fine and superior sort of running. There are some folk who run by fits and starts. Their religious life moves in spurts and spasms. The consistent speed is broken by lapses, by irritations, by impatience. The secret of progress is an even pace, a patient keeping at it all along the road. And I am perfectly sure that in the word "patience" we are to find something of restfulness. Yes, however contradictory it may seem, we are to be restful runners. That is to be one of our supreme distinctions. It is just the difference between fervor and fever. It is the difference between faithfulness and fussiness. It is the difference between thoughtfulness and anxiety. It is the difference between thinking and fretting. It is the element of restfulness in running. It is a certain cool patience even when we are running with all our might. "He that believeth shall not get into a fuss." Patient running means a consistent and distributed intensity all along the road.

And the secret of all this is to be found in a certain detachment of vision—"Looking unto Jesus. In the original word there is quite a suggestion of a deliberate turning of the eyes from one thing to another. We are to look away from something in order that we may look towards something. We are to direct our eyes from other things to Christ. "Looking unto Jesus." Then, the great matter is this—that look relates us to the object of the look, it incorporates us with the Lord. We begin to draw strength from the resources of an infinite Ally. We breathe heavenly air. We imbibe the water of life. We feed upon hidden manna. The Lord Jehovah is our strength. J. H. J.

The Great Sympathy of God

MONDAY. I Pet. 3:18. "The just for the unjust." "The innocent cannot suffer for the guilty." Some say, but if that be so, the universe is out of gear. For the innocent are suffering for the guilty all around us. Do not parents agonize for their wayward children? Is there no such thing as heredity? The physical ills which we endure are most largely an inheritance from those who have gone before us.

Why, then, should it be thought unnatural that God should suffer in our behalf? Is He not our Father? Is not sympathy the noblest, as well as the commonest thing is our experience?

It is at this point that humanity reaches its highest level. Blessed is the man who voluntarily bears the burdens of others! Should we not, then, expect something of the same sort in God? He made us in His likeness. It would be monstrous if He, as a Father, did not sympathize with His children who have fallen into trouble.

The cross, which is the historic symbol of vicarious pain, is the sublimest expression of sympathy in the universe. The cross is precisely what ought to be expected in the nature of things. It is just like God! D. J. B.

What Grieved Jesus

TUESDAY. Mark 3:5. "Being grieved for the hardness of their hearts." The idea of God coming to earth is not an unfamiliar thought in theology. The doctrine of incarnation is a common thing in religion. On the very face of it, if there be a God, He should come to earth. But earth has pictured Him a happy God. Yet behold Jesus, a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.

The nearest picture to this outside of Christianity is the Greek myth of Prometheus, in whom some scholars have seen an unconscious prophecy of Christ. The unique thing about the grief of Jesus is what occasioned it. He might have grieved over His homelessness or His unpopularity or the apparent failure of His ministry, but He did not. The things that grieved Him were hard hearts of men, spiritual blindness, the prospect of the ruin of the city of His love, and the thought of the world's deep need and sin. His heart was as a sensitive plate on which were recorded all the world's weakness and woe.

What a light this sheds on His attitude to the world! We see evidences of people's stupidity, and despise them. We see evidences of their hard hearts, and condemn them. Jesus saw all this, and was grieved. He is grieved still. Most of all is He grieved at our spiritual poverty and our hardness of heart.

What are the symptoms of a hard heart? The chief symptom is lack of sensibility to spiritual impressions. Only one thing can keep our hearts tender, and that is the constant thought of the suffering Christ. The Holy Spirit keeps us in remembrance of Him. Thus we grieve over the things that grieved Him, and show ourselves possessed of the mind that was in Christ. C. C. A.

How Christians Live

WEDNESDAY. I Phil. 1:24. "For me to live is Christ." Some years ago students were very much interested in Glover's book "The Jesus of History," in which the author told how the early Christians lived. The standard set by those early Christians is as good for the twentieth century as it was in the first century. In the first place, those early Christians "out-thought" the world in which they were placed. The mind of Christ was the model for their minds. Unless the Church makes it the business of its life to direct the thought of the world, we shall soon have a pagan, rather than a Christian world.

In the second place those early Christians "out-lived" the world in which they were placed. "This does not mean that they live longer than those who were not Christians," says Bishop McDowell, "but that they lived better." They lived more sanely, more consistently, more nobly, more kindly, more soberly, more godly. This of course was the result of their better thinking, because mind is the master of conduct, and conduct the master of character. Great is the power of example! The worldly will listen to the counsel of an ungodly man, but it never follows that man. The street-corner orator, hurling his invectives against the Christian church, always has an audience, but never leads a righteous crusade. Good men inspire to godliness. Consistency is its own eloquence.

Then those early Christians "out-died" the world in which they were placed. John Wesley said, "Our people die well." The pagan dies without hope, the Christian knows no despair. The gospel uproots weeping willows and plants evergreens on the pilgrim path of life. Those who die in Christ because they have lived in Christ do not pass on like a defeated army coming home with banners dragging in the dust, but rather as victorious army marching under its triumphal arch, with banners flying. Life without the immortal hope is like a problem without an answer, an earth without a sun, a sky without a star. Death is not an end but a beginning. It is the end of Time, but it is also the beginning of Eternity and therein lies the difference between despair and hope. R. B.

Walking with Jesus

THURSDAY. I John 2:6. "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also to walk even as He walked." What were Christ's first methods in seeking to save a lost world? Behold Him working miracles to appease hunger, unstopping deaf ears, touching blind eyes into vision, calling the dead to life. Was He not reaching the soul through the body, helping the mortal to behold the immortal? John the Baptist was a desert recluse, but Jesus came, eating and drinking with publicans and sinners. He accepted invitations to social festivities, reaching the people in a friendly way that He might unfold to them the fellowships of the higher and holier life. Every action, every step of our Lord's three years among men had a spiritual significance. The secular and religious were one with Him; serving men was serving God.

After His wonderful discourses previous to the Last Supper and immediately following that memorable Passover that was to be reproduced in all coming ages, Jesus, knowing that He came from God and was returning to God, that He was the King of kings, laid aside His outer garments and took a towel and basin, washing the feet of His disciples, as an example of the ministry of service. Are we following in His footsteps, observing lowly, menial duties with a view to the promotion of the highest ideals? Are not many missionaries catching this spirit, when building hospitals and homes, institutions of learning, in connection with church building, teaching farming and the use of the inventions of civilization before cultivating the garden of the soul?

Kindly service breaks down the middle wall of partition between races, classes, labor and capital; the human heart responds to generous aid given by the followers of Christ.

Behold the great Master, after washing the feet of the disciples, climbing the hill of Calvary, stretching out His arms to a dying world, bursting open the gates of the tomb on the heavenward side, making a pathway of light for men through the valley, upward to the skies! Is it not a high honor to walk with Him Who was so great in His humanities, so infinite in His divinities, so glorious in His kingly triumphs? Shall we not go with Him all the way? E. W. C.

No Real Faith Without Works

FRIDAY. James 1:17. "Faith without Works." Had the prodigal on his return appeared at the doorway of his father's house with an evil companion beside him, one with whom he had consorted in the "far country," is it supposable that the hospitality of the old home would have been extended to him? Sin is the seducer of the world. He who courts the hospitality of Heaven must abjure it.

Not a word is said of the subsequent life of the prodigal; but it goes without saying that his former habits were given up. No more wasting of his substance in riotous living; no more habitual indulgence in sin.

This is what is expected of those who enjoy and appreciate the privileges involved in a filial relation with God. Character is the visible test of a Christian profession. "By their fruits ye shall know them." We are saved by faith in Christ; but "faith without works is dead." There is no life, no reality, no truth, nothing in it. D. J. B.

Sanctity and Sanity

SATURDAY. II Tim. 1:7. "For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." The idea prevails among people who are not well informed that Christianity commends itself to people who are not of a critical turn of mind. It is amazing, however, to what extent Christianity has controlled men and women of the most acute and comprehensive intellects. It is needless to speak of Paul, one of the really great constructive intellects of the world. Three hundred years later there was Augustine, a mind-worthy the respect of the keenest philosopher, who did not accept Christianity until he had thoroughly examined every competing faith.

Among our contemporaries were two men of very different types. One was a soldier, who fought in China and in the Soudan, and who went unarmed into the presence of the bloodthirsty King John of Abyssinia. He was Gordon, who kept a daily half-hour for conversation, not about Christ, but, as he believed, with Christ. The other is an explorer, Sir Ernest Shackleton, who in his book called "South," in which he relates his search for the South Pole, tells this experience:

"When I look back at those days, I have no doubt Providence guided us, not only across those snow-fields, but across the storm-white sea that separates Elephant Island from our landing-place on South Georgia. I know that during that long and racking march of thirty-six hours over unnamed mountains and glaciers, it seemed to me that often we were four, not three. I said nothing to my companions on the point, but afterwards Worsley said to me, 'I had a curious feeling on the march that there was another person with us.' Crean confessed to the same idea. One feels 'the dearth of human words, the roughness of mortal speech' in trying to describe things intangible; but a record of our journeys would be incomplete without a reference to a subject very near to our hearts." U. S. ROYAL CORD

A famous tire—a famous tread. Acknowledged among motorists and dealers alike as the world's foremost example of Cord tire building. Always delivering the same repeated economy, tire after tire, and season after season. The stripe around the side-walls is registered as a trademark in the U. S. Patent Office.

You'll find a clue to tire worth in the way the tire is sold—

AT sometime or other most of us have noticed the baffled expression of a car-owner buying a tire.

Here's a man trying to use his common sense. All that he asks for is good service at the right price.

Instead the dealer quotes a "big discount."

And then the guessing begins.

* * *

"So much off the list," says the dealer.

"How good is the tire?" replies the prospective purchaser.

"As good as any," says the dealer.

"Then why the big discount?" wonders the customer.

Two men really miles apart in their transaction because there is no confidence.

* * *

More and more the public keeps backing away from "discount" tires.

With simple logic, thousands and thousands of car-owners brush aside excuses and explanations—and put their faith in U. S. Royal Cords.

The par quality tire at a net price.

Built by a policy that stands today, tomorrow and all the time for the best expression of what human science knows about cord pneumatics.

Sold to the user with a consciousness of what he is always entitled to—with a deep respect for confidence as the surest basis for all human transactions.

* * *

U. S. Royal Cords never have discharged their responsibilities of leadership in so far-reaching a way as now.

In the face of all tendencies to sacrifice tire standards to meet market emergencies—you will find U. S. Royal Cords defending the quality pledge which every vital industry owes to the public it serves.

Saul Teaching at Antioch

International Sunday-School Lesson for July 31

Acts 11:19-30; 12:25

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

EXTENSION of the Kingdom of God, rather than of entrance into it, is the work of the individual. We share in the work of Christ, which is to be heralds of the great Evangel. The apostles, by their very name, are those who were called that they might be sent forth to become witnesses in order that souls might be won through Christ unto God. Saul and Barnabas are now found well established in the King's Business. The same is true of others, such as Peter, many disciples and the apostles. Study the record of some of the events as you read from Acts 9:31 to the beginning of this lesson. The places named in the opening verse of our lesson indicate how far-reaching was their work.

Antioch will soon become another great center of influence. It need not be called a rival of Jerusalem, for the type of work is quite different. Both Jerusalem and Antioch could rejoice together as the life of Jesus Christ is seen in the lives of men and women. Men from Cyprus and Cyrene are effective preachers to the Greeks. In Antioch and under the blessing of God a great number that believed declared their faith openly in that Godless city on the Orontes. If any city of that day needed the gospel it was Antioch. In "Ben Hur" you will find most picturesque descriptions. At that time the city had a population of 500,000, but today the number is about 28,000. Had Antioch lived up to Saul's teaching the figures would be different. There is a judgment of places as well as of people.

Barnabas was commissioned by the Church at Jerusalem to visit Antioch and help there if possible. God was precious unto Barnabas and He rejoiced to see that Gentiles, too, were believers in Christ, the Son of God. Peter had previously discovered, by revelation, that God was no respecter of persons, and now Barnabas meets the Antiochian situation with a message of exhortation to continue in the faith. This new leadership from Jerusalem became an inspiration: the numbers of believers so increased that additional teachers must be found.

THE Acts of the Apostles, whether in the first century or in the twentieth, brings men and women into prominence. The study of history is always the study of biography. While Paul soon becomes the central figure the companions of this leader should be noted one by one. A very helpful book, now out of print, may be found in some second-hand book stores and is "The Metaphors of St. Paul" and "The Companions of St. Paul," in one volume, by John S. Howson. The chapter on Barnabas is fine. Learn all you can about this "Son of Consolation" by using your concordance, Bible dictionary, etc. Ask some one in the class to prepare a paper concerning this companion of Paul. Both the favorable and unfavorable will be presented in such a character study. It will be remembered that when Saul came to Jerusalem he was not trusted until Barnabas vouched for him. It may have been that Barnabas of Cyprus, and Saul of Tarsus, had known each other or even studied together at Tarsus, the city of the mainland which was only a short sail from Cyprus.

"Great-heart" is a good name for Barnabas. He, too, must decrease as the new teacher becomes known. But when there is need at Antioch for a worthy leader Barnabas goes to Tarsus to hunt up Saul. Three years have probably elapsed since Saul left Jerusalem for his home town. The closest scrutiny of these years does not change the purpose of Barnabas, but rather intensifies him in his purpose to bring Saul to Antioch. If, meanwhile, Saul had wondered if God had forgotten him, or if the Damascus call was unrelated to a mission, the answer is now very clear. Those three years could be classed with the Arabia experience which was studied last week. In fact, Tarsus became his laboratory before the larger work of Kingdom-building began. It is great to be a discoverer. You can also be a Barnabas in that you find those who can be given place of opportunity. A Sunday-school teacher is always a prospector, and often wonderful ability is discovered. Who in your class or Sunday school today can be developed into a world leader for tomorrow? John Mark was another worthy who was discovered by Barnabas, even though he was his nephew. It may be that the world has the Gospel according to Mark just because this young man was not left at Jerusalem when Barnabas and Saul went back to Antioch.

At times people decline to enter into church activity when their sojourn in a certain place is to be limited. They make the excuse: "I am going to be here only a year." Now observe by way of contrast the golden text: "For a whole year they were gathered together with the church, and taught much people." A year can be looked at positively as well as negatively. A "whole year" for service! A village can be turned upside down for Jesus Christ in that time. This is a lesson that will be studied when many are on their vacations. Often vacationists have given help and inspiration that have stirred up things in a wonderful way to the glory of God. Religion and its practice covers 365 days in every year and sometimes 366. Those with ability for social leadership are quickly discovered even on a trip across the ocean or in a week or a month at a summer resort, and how hard they work and work others also.

YOU have a name to live and that is the name that was first given to a certain class of people at Antioch—CHRISTIANS. It may not have been in derision. It was certainly a characterizing name, a worthy name. People took knowledge of those in that congregation of believers in Antioch and observed that they were like unto the One of whom they taught. The name was announced and has been given to the same kind of people ever since. Today on the foreign mission field missionaries, because of their lives, are called Jesus-men. This typifying name—Christian—has, during all these centuries, had an enlarging meaning as well as an ever-increasing following. There were only a few of them in Antioch, but now there are about 600,000,000 in the world.

Discuss in your class or think out for yourself what sort of person one should be who is a Christian. Then face the question—"To what extent do I live up to the name by which I call myself?" Do we merely wear the uniform or are we soldiers on actual service?

The prophecy of Jesus is evidenced in continuous experience when He said: "Ye have the poor always with you." Antioch, and in fact all the Gentile-Christian world was ready to respond when they learned through Agabus, Paul, or others that the poor saints at Jerusalem needed help. The newly established churches did not resort to communism but they did recognize the continuing obligation of Christian stewardship. During recent months the three great famine appeals have had a large response. The Christian Herald China Famine Fund has saved many thousands of lives, and the givers are richer rather than poorer by reason of their sharing. Right in this summer time, when you may be on vacation, remember the kiddies in our big cities. The Christian Herald is again ready to be your partner, if you will permit, and use your gift in giving cheer, health and Christian atmosphere to some who are in great need. Your dollars will give blessed outings at the fresh-air home at Mont-Lawn.

Then I chopped off a lump of my pitch (you know cold pitch is hard and black but breaks quite easily) and threw it into the skillet. I put it on my fire and soon my pitch began to melt and bubble, bubble and melt.

A difficulty came with the application of the pitch to the canoe. You know pitch cools and stiffens so quickly that you scarcely dare take it off the fire to use it.

"The way to do," I explained to Kent, "is to brush a coat of pitch wherever there is a weak spot. Have a strip of canvas cut to the proper size to cover the place. Lay the canvas on the pitch and press it down while still hot. Then brush another layer of pitch over the strip of canvas."

"Fine!" said Kent. "Let's see you do it."

THE first attempt I made the pitch stiffened right out on my brush.

"That's because I forgot to heat the brush," I explained. When I had heated my brush in the pitch I tried again and this time I did manage to spread the pitch on the canoe. But the canvas patch did not stick very well and when I took another brushful of pitch from the skillet to daub on top, I found the stuff was already congealing, though it had been off the fire only a couple of minutes.

"This stuff's worse'n pancakes the way it cools off," I said.

"It surely is," agreed Kent. "Why not use the gasoline torch? I can keep the flame playing on your skillet all the time that you are using the pitch, no matter where you carry it."

That settled it. You know what a gasoline torch is for heat? If a patch cooled before we were ready we let the torch blow on it a couple of seconds and melted the pitch so that it could be set exactly right. We certainly used some pitch on that canoe. It was pretty black.

Of course Kate had to come up just at that anxious moment when we were ready to test our work.

"You run away," I said. "I'd rather you didn't see it until it's all done."

"Don't be so selfish about your old canoe," she said. "I'm just anxious to know if it will float."

I had no doubt that it would float, but Kent thought it would be well to let it stand over night before putting it in the water, so Kate's interest was not rewarded.

It was nearly supper time, but just then I saw Mr. Persmann going to his cottage. I dodged quietly away from the others and followed him to the cottage. It was daylight now and I must take a look at that boy who lived with him.

But I met a great disappointment. The person in the house ran out to meet him. The last rays of the sun lit up the porch. I could see everything beyond any deception.

Smash went my theories. The boy at Persmann's was a girl!

CHAPTER IV

RIGHT after breakfast we were ready to test the canoe. I felt so good about the prospect that I was willing to forgive Kate for being so superior, and allow her to come with us.

We watched the canoe anxiously as it touched the water. It slid gently in at a light push and gradually it lay upon the lake in its full, graceful length. And not a drop of water came through—not a single drop!

I got in to see if my weight would open up any leaks. Not one.

Then Kent got in. Still not a leak. Then, to be really generous, I invited Kate to get in. Would you believe it, that girl wouldn't come. She stood on the dock and spouted a defiant refusal in verse.

"Come on, Kate," I urged. "I'm sorry I hurt your feelings."

"Being sorry isn't enough. I know, from what you said, how you really feel. I know that you dislike to have me as much as look at your old canoe. So I won't come."

"You needn't be so sore, Kate," I said in desperation. "I'm willing you should do anything you like with the canoe. Come along and I'll just give you my share."

"Will you, too, Kent?" she asked. Kent never can refuse her anything.

"I reckon so," he said. "But I'll have to use it sometimes."

So then she came as nice as anything and got in the middle of the canoe. And even then, carrying three of us, it was tight as a drum.

"It's just grand," said Kate "and I heard father and mother agree last night that since you boys have done all the work it should be your canoe. And now you've each given me your shares, so it is all mine. Isn't that lovely?"

I could very nearly have hollered, but I held in and said never a word. Afterwards I was most awfully glad of it. This is what happened. At dinner there was a note under my plate. It was from Kate:

"Jerry, the canoe is all yours. I have teased you a lot, but you're a real sport. Run down and see it now.—KATE."

I ran down to the dock. There it was. On the bow was painted "Invincible II" in large letters, and underneath, "Jerry King." No one could paint letters as nicely as Kate. It had not occurred to her that the canoe still had to be painted.

THE first thing I did with that canoe was to attempt a service for Major Bassel. I paddled up the little creek to the boat-landing that served Persmann for his cottage. I wanted to discover the fate of the original Invincible, and I wanted to find more about that girl.

The little creek wound around in and out so that it was a much longer journey by boat than by the road, but finally I reached the landing. There was no sign of a boat of any kind. A few feet from the landing stood a large barn. It had two windows, but they were high up and the doors were closed.

I was just starting to see if the doors were locked when the bark of a dog caused me to run back to the safety of my canoe. I am a great respecter of dogs, although, of course, I'm not afraid of them. My inclination was to paddle back, but I had not seen a thing of the girl yet, and I remembered how the Major said that the reason that he made good in the war was because when he feared anything he just had to go forward to prove to himself that he wasn't afraid, so I took a paddle along for company and started to the house.

I saw the dog in a minute. He was standing beneath the porch barking and wagging his tail simultaneously. That didn't look very vicious, so I laid my paddle aside and began to get acquainted. It was an easy job, for the dog came right up and began to lick my face as soon as I gave him any encouragement.

The door opened suddenly and there stood the girl.

"Take the dog away with you," she requested. "He's a good dog, but my uncle doesn't like him. He says he'll kill him if he stays around here."

"Kill a nice, young collie like that!" I exclaimed.

"That's what he says and I'm afraid he'll do it. You take him."

"I'll be glad of the chance," said I. "And I'll take good care of him, too."

THE dog followed me into the canoe without any trouble and I had almost reached our dock before I remembered that I had asked no questions about the boat, nor about the girl's supposed brother. I would have gone back but I was anxious to show my dog to Kent and Kate.

Kate was so ecstatic over the collie that I began to be afraid I might have to give him to her. Kent was more critical.

"Nice enough pup," he agreed. "But a collie's no good unless he is properly trained."

"I'll train him," I said.

"What do you know about training a collie?" asked Kent.

I made no answer. I knew what I meant but I could not have told it even to the Major. I had never known a mother. I had never had a sister. I had never had a brother. I had never even had a dog in all my life. The training that collie would get from me would do just one thing. It would make him follow me through everything. That was all that I wanted him to learn. He began it that night, and I slept the sounder for the knowledge that there slept on the floor beneath my cot, my own faithful dog.

Kent and I always began the morning with a swim. We had done it every day since that first exciting morning and I had reached the place where it was real swimming now. But this morning I was thinking all the time of a chance to break away and get back to the Persmann cottage. That place seemed to have a tremendous attraction for me.

I was going right after breakfast, but Kent held me again. He wanted to play "burn-up." Playing burn-up with Kent is no joke. You know you take a ball and shoot it back and forth just as hot as you can and as swift as you can and see which fellow holds out best. My hands were all red and stinging in a short time, so when Kent was called away for a minute I slipped the ball in my pocket and off I went into the woods.

I had been reading an old copy of "Huckleberry Finn" and it had given me an idea about that girl which I was very keen to try out.

WHEN I got close to the cottage I whistled, and after the girl had looked through the window to see who was there, she came out.

"Hullo!" I hollered. "Catch this!" I took the baseball out of my pocket and threw it at her the way I had been throwing at Kent. She caught it and threw it back to me.

"Want to play 'burn-up'?" I asked. "Yes," she said.

Then she thought a minute, and said, "No. Girls don't play that kind of game. I wish I had a good book to read."

I guess she saw the book sticking out of my pocket. I handed it to her and once more I went off without making inquiries about the lost boat. I wanted to think. She wouldn't play "burn-up" because it wasn't a girl's game. But when she caught that ball and threw it back she had said plenty. Girls don't throw that way. I had thought something was wrong all the time. Now I was nearly sure that girl was really a boy!

I found Kent and Kate at an old place that lay back in the woods some distance from everywhere, which we called the deserted cabin. It had been built by a club member who wanted to be a hermit. But he had not found hermiting just what he had anticipated and so the little old place had been deserted for years. Kate had taken possession. I had helped fix the roof and tinker up the door hinges, so had declared it to be part mine.

Kate was so excited by my story that she actually forgot to make a rhyme, but she was not convinced in a minute.

"Throw your ball to me, Jerry. Come outside and throw it real hard."

I threw as hard as I could, and when I caught the return ball it stung my palms. She caught and threw exactly like a boy.

"But there were other things," I insisted. "It wasn't only the ball. The first thing I noticed was that he walked and ran so funny for a girl. Then there was his voice, and he wanted to read boy's books, and everything."

"I guess it's all true," said Kent. "But what I'm trying to show you is that it wouldn't be enough proof for father to act on. He might ask Persmann about the boy. All the good that would do would be to put him on his guard."

"But what shall we do?" "Take things into our own hands," said Kate, savagely. "We'll have to get hold of that boy-girl or girl-boy in some way. Why not kidnap him and bring him up here to the deserted cottage?"

"And what good would that do us?" asked Kent, who always wants to know what is to follow before he does anything.

"What good? We can make him own up to the truth."

"Well?" "Well! What more do we want? If he tells the truth, won't that clear up the mystery of the missing bonds and papers?"

"Perhaps it will," Kent admitted.

"Of course it will," I insisted. "For a fellow supposed to have something under his hat, you often make me wonder."

I WAS not so very keen on this kidnapping job. It wouldn't be a bit easy. There were two of us, three if you counted Kate, but the thing had to be done in broad daylight, while Persmann was away from home, and without any disturbance.

Perhaps you have tried to be a kidnapper at some time, tried to take a fellow some place he didn't want to go by main force. If he tries to resist, the advantage is all with the resister. He can wrap himself around things so that he seems like an advertisement for liquid glue. He can get under beds or tables. He can make it almost impossible to get him through a door. He can shout and quite likely he can bite.

"We'll have to steal up on that boy when he's taking a nap, put a gag in his mouth and tie his hands and feet, or he'll rouse everybody on the club grounds," I said, thinking things over.

"He'll be a good weight to carry up here, at that," said Kent.

"Who said we could carry him?" objected Kate. "I just wonder sometimes if those pompadours you boys are raising sap your brain-power. We will get that boy up here walking on his own feet and coming very quietly, if not stealthily. We will use strategy."

"Oh! That's different," said Kent. "If Kate's going to apply some of her strategy, I quit. I'm entirely out of it. I remember—"

"That'll do, Kent Bassel." Kate's voice was almost at the breaking point. "I want you to remember that this is serious and sacred. It's for father. It's an effort to clear away the cloud in his life that is making him so solemn and old and serious."

Old folks may smile and think we were being very tragic over nothing, but to us this was just as serious as Kate's breaking voice indicated.

AFTER all Kate's strategy was simple enough. Collie had a thorn in his paw. I was to urge his ex-master to come to the cottage to look at him. The boy needed no great urging, for he was wild to get away from the desolation and confinement of the Persmann cottage. It was not until he had crossed the threshold of the deserted cottage and begun his examination of Collie's paw that Kent showed himself. The boy knew him at once.

"You are Mr. Bassel's son," he said. "What are you doing here?"

"I might better ask what you are doing, dressed up in girl's clothes," said Kent. "I know you. Your name is Harold Persmann. When my father was in the same office with Mr. Pers-mann, you were there doing some kind of office-boy work."

The boy hesitated a moment.

"Well, I didn't tell you who I was, did I? You just found out."

"That's it. We just found out."

"I'm glad you did. I promised Mr. Persmann I wouldn't tell, and I didn't. But I'm mighty glad to get the thing found out by somebody, so I can quit playing girl and be natural again."

"But why should you be playing girl?"

"Just to oblige Mr. Persmann. He asked me to do it. He explained that I was supposed to be down South, and that he would get into trouble if it were known that he had brought me up here. At first I thought it a kind of a lark, but I've been tired of it for a long time."

"Do you like your uncle, Mr. Persmann, very much," I asked.

"Mr. Persmann isn't really my uncle. He is a step-brother of my father. And I don't see what difference it makes to you if I like him or not."

"It does make a difference. The question is how much we dare tell you."

"If it will do any good to say so, I don't like him at all. I never did like him. But I'm an orphan. My sister and I would be paupers only he took enough care of us to keep us from starving. And he did it because he is my father's step-brother—no real relation at all. So I ought to like him."

"I'm glad Mr. Persmann's been nice to you," said Kate. "I'm afraid we haven't given him credit for being kind to anyone."

"But he hasn't been nice and he isn't nice," demurred Harold. "Most of the time he is downright mean."

"Well, Harold Persmann, you remember my father?"

"Mr. Bassel? Oh, yes, very well. He was one who really was good to me. I liked him fine."

"And do you remember when he went away to war?"

"Yes, I was in the office then. He got a telegram and went right off."

"And do you remember his getting a package of valuable papers that morning, and what he did with them?"

We waited breathlessly for the reply that would mean so much, for no one could doubt that Harold Persmann was telling the truth.

"No!" he said, and a great cloud settled down upon us. "No, I don't remember anything special that he did that morning. I feel very sure that he didn't give anything of the kind to me to deliver to anyone, or if he did, he said nothing about their value. He might have given them to some other person right before my eyes and I not remember it."

I glanced at Kent and Kate. Funeral mutes could not have looked gloomier.

"We were so hopeful that you would remember something about those papers," said Kate. "It would mean so much to my father. Won't you try hard to remember? Please try."

Scrapping the Human Scrap Heap

The matter will doubtless long be a moot question. The fact remains, however, that the expenditure of a relatively small sum results in a tremendous gain, financially and otherwise, to the state.

To create and maintain this new Bureau of Rehabilitation, the Pennsylvania legislature appropriated $100,000 to cover all expenses for two years. That means $50,000 a year. With the initial $50,000, the machinery of the Bureau has been created, and 750 persons so benefited that it is believed they will create, on the average, $1,000 more value apiece than they could have created without the help so rendered. In other words, the expenditure of this initial $50,000 has resulted in an increased industrial production valued at $750,000. With the Bureau now actually created, with the results of its first year of experiments to build on, it is wholly reasonable to suppose that subsequent years will see a relatively greater return from each dollar appropriated.

Every step upward, in whatever field of life, has always been taken in the face of obstacles and objectors. From a purely theoretical point of view, perhaps, one may question the right to spend public money for private benefits. From the point of view of making a better state and a better citizenry, the expenditure is wholly justified. Ultimately that becomes the norm by which we judge all legislation. And that is a proper standard. For, just as a proper government derives its powers from the consent of the governed, so the object of government should always be to minister to the welfare of the governed.

The human scrap heap has long been one of the reproaches to civilization. By scrapping the scrap heap, government will take another long step upward.

American manufacturers who are planning to establish trade in agricultural instruments with China should paint their plows red and letter them with a Chinese name, according to Dr. Reisner, of Nanking University. Many of the plows now sent over are blue, but the Chinese has his own ideas regarding color schemes, and will deal only with manufacturers who meet his specifications.

The Sacredness of Music and Song

E. L. Psa. 100: 1-5; I Chron. 15: 16, Ex. 15: 1-9

MUSIC had the sanction of holy men in Bible times and music has had the sanction of the Church since. The subject is one that will need much history reading to do it justice, but to the student of music as well as the student in general such a study will lead into many a pleasant path. More than half a million hymns have been written in the more than two hundred languages and dialects in which Christianity is preached. Hymns are the Christian's marching songs which make for the martial spirit in the fight of faith and put courage into faint hearts. Hymns also contain a body of theology and of doctrine that teaches as much as the written prose and spoken word of the press and pulpit.

Scarcely a hymn that has not been based on the religious experience of its composer. Fortunately these great stories of our famous hymns are finding their way into print. A very good book on the subject is "Modern Messages from Great Hymns" by Robert Elmer Smith, published by the Abingdon Press. Our young men and women should read that book and others, for a knowledge of the meaning of the hymns they sing and for the spiritual truths they contain. The hymn book is neglected. The Epworth League can do much toward a revival of interest in the songs of the faith. Make this evening a hymn night. Invite your pastor to explain the hymns. Have everybody sing. It will be an evening of great inspiration and profit.

The Influence of the Bible on Literature, Art, Music and Law

B. Y. P. U. Psa. 19: 1-14

NOTHING worth-while has ever been written, painted, sung, or thought that is not based on the Bible. The Bible is the maker of progress and civilization, the inspiration of all that is noble, the creator of all that is good. Destroy, if that were possible, every copy of the Bible in existence and you would be reminded on every hand of the existence of that Bible in literature, art, music law and every boon and blessing of the age.

"Wherever it (the Bible) comes it ennobles and enriches human life, opens common sources of consolation and cheer, helps men to understand and respect one another, gives a loftier tone to philosophy, a deeper meaning to history and a purer light to poetry."—Henry Van Dyke.

"Save for my daily range Among the pleasant fields of Holy Writ, I might despair."—Tennyson.

"My only hope for the world is bringing the human mind into contact with Divine Revelation."—Gladstone.

Enrich this meeting by having the members recount some instance wherein the Bible has been an influence. Illustrations are not difficult to find, but the gold needs mining. This is a challenge to the young people as to their reading and knowledge in general. An excellent book in connection with this topic is "The Fascination of the Book" by Edgar Whittaker Work. Every verse of the Scripture reference is helpful in studying this topic, for it is a running commentary on the theme.

Christian Progress Among the Indians

C. E. Isa. 61: 1-9
(Home Missionary Meeting)

THERE are 336,000 Indians in America. Only 75,000 of them can read and write and less than 100,000 even speak English, we are told. For some reason or another, which we may as well call indifference, the church has neglected the "first families" of our country. We may make our boast of ancestry coming over in the Mayflower but let us not forget that the Indian was on the reception committee.

Although neglected, he is not any more neglected than other groups in the home mission field. But like these other groups the Indian is not wholly neglected. We are thankful that pioneer work has been done. All of the denominations are doing something, but not all the denominations are doing all they can do. If the young men and women of today are looking for a life of thrills and adventures let them read the life of David Brainerd, who began as far back as 1744 to blaze a trail to the heart of the Indian and follow in his footsteps. Much good work is being accomplished on the Black-foot Reservation where there are schools and industrial classes for old and young. The value of the church property is about $100,000.

But there are star-distances between what has been accomplished and that which needs to be done. The Indian is responsive and the government is ready to assist. Both depend on our determination to enter into this very important and picturesque field of ministry and service.

3 Reasons

among many others, why you should renew your subscription and continue to read the Christian Herald the next year:

1. It is the only national journal that interprets the developments of the day in terms of Christianity.

2. It is the only journal of national circulation that built itself and maintains itself with ever increasing success, by its devotion to humanity and its consecration to the cause of the Kingdom.

3. Because it is the only national medium by which you can keep in touch with the greatest preachers of all denominations, learn from the most able exponents of the Sunday School lessons and Young People's topics, and be informed by the best minds in the world on all the big questions of the day that have their bearing on the spread of Christian principles and doctrines.

The Christian Herald is a tremendous power for good and it is your subscription, multiplied thousands of times in every town and village in the country, that makes this power count.

We don't want to lose a single unit of this force.

Questions and Answers

SEVERAL Readers. We receive many letters calling for explanations of Bible questions dealing with life, death, conversion and a very large number of problems which have been discussed at different times in the Mail-Bag in recent years. For the convenience of our readers generally, we have prepared two handy volumes of "Difficult Bible Questions Answered," in which 1,000 subjects are dealt with, and the whole range of leading commentators and distinguished Bible authorities is drawn upon to furnish the latest and most conclusive information on practically all of the "hard knots" and difficult passages that are encountered by Bible readers. We would counsel all who are interested in having accurate information, readily available, on the widest range of religious questions, to procure these two volumes. They can be obtained through the Book Department, Christian Herald, New York.

Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with their wives, Sarah, Rebekah and Leah, are mentioned in Gen. 23: 19; 25: 9 and 49: 30. This was the earliest sepulchre of the patriarchs. It has been visited and described by many travelers of note. Former United States Ambassador Henry Morgenthau, in a recent article, writes of it: "In 1914 I visited the famous caves of Machpelah, twenty miles from Jerusalem and there saw the authentic tombs of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

this, that if the usual course of war, instead of unroofing peasant's houses, and ravaging peasants' fields, merely broke the china upon your drawing-room tables, no war in civilized countries could last a week. I tell you more, that at whatever moment you choose to put a period to war, you could do it with less trouble than you take any day to go out to dinner."

Just this: that some 90,000, including several thousand women, passed in their money to see a 30-minute fist fight. One of my acquaintances who saw the whole show says that he was strongly reminded of the old lines:

"Wherever God sets up a house of prayer,
The devil's sure to have a chapel there;
And 'twill be found, upon examination,

A "Won't Work" Company

But This Missionary Enterprise in Japan Really Does Work

The Company

By WILLIAM MERRELL VORIES

BUSINESS is business" affirm our good friends whose consciences are trained to one set of rules for home and church and another for the office and the shop. That the utopian theories of dreamers "won't work" in the business and professional world is the excuse for sweat shop, slum, and the labor-capital unrest.

Ten years ago in rural Japan an experiment was begun in the demonstration of Christian principles in business. The need for architectural services in connection with the many building operations of all mission bodies in the Empire became apparent. The beginnings of an interior mission demanded support, and the founder's having architectural training pointed to that means as meeting the two needs.

But the canons of precedent and the dictates of conservatives proclaimed the impossibility of achieving success in a country town. At least the earning department of the mission, the professional company, must be located in the Capital!

However, in the face of the cold water of "won't work" prophecies, the company opened an office in the extreme "inaka" (backwoods), and while it was at it, made its whole program "impossible." For instance, with pressing needs to earn financial support for its Mission and with the early clients clamoring for quick service, the drafting-room was provided with no artificial lighting facilities. Night work for the employees was thus made not only against the rules but an impossibility. The eyes of the men were put above the noses of the clients! A tennis court was provided and working hours adjusted to permit daily exercise. Exercise became a required subject. Health and happiness are not only an important part of life, but are good for business. Besides Sunday rest, Saturday afternoons were made holidays.

In Japan Sunday is free only to schools and government offices. Local companies predicted speedy failure to a business so desultory as to lie idle a whole day each week. We replied that the men who do the work of the world are even more entitled to rest periods than those who ornament the cushioned chairs of officialdom. So it became part of the company's specifications that no Sunday work be permitted upon the premises of any of the buildings it has planned and is superintending—even by contractors and workmen without conviction or practice regarding Sunday-rest.

It has been impressive to observe the effects of this "un-workable" attempt to "hurry the East." Some contractors have been won to the practice, even on jobs not under our control, and several prominent clients who had no scruples on the point, but were in great haste about their buildings, have yielded rather than lose our services; and some of these have become advocates of this and other considerations for workmen through this experience.

Another "won't-work" principle was part of

The Man

By C. E. WRIGHT

WILLIAM MERRELL VORIES, "the missionary architect of Lake Biwa," is looked upon as one of the wonder-workers of Japan, and his work in establishing an independent and undenominational mission at Hachiman, Province of Omi, on the shores of Lake Biwa, as one of the most remarkable accomplishments of missionary history.

Almost single-handed he fought the opposition of Buddhism and Shintoism. He supported his mission, first as a teacher of English in the Hachiman Government school, and when that position was taken from him, by working as an architect for the Japan Y. M. C. A. and the missions of Protestant churches. Thus he became known as "the missionary architect of Lake Biwa."

This is Vories' story:

A number of years ago he was a student in Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colo. To help pay his way through school he served during his spare hours as assistant secretary of the Colorado Springs Y. M. C. A.

As a student he showed marked interest and unusual aptitude for architecture, and he later became assistant to the president of the college in supervising the construction work on several college buildings.

Before he had finished his college course, Vories enlisted as a student volunteer for foreign missions. He had expressed certain ideas as to the type of work he preferred. He wished to be sent to some neglected portion of the globe to begin a pioneer mission, and, if possible, to earn his own living rather than to be paid a salary for his services.

His opportunity came in 1905 when he set sail for Japan under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. to become a teacher of English in the Government commercial schools of Hachiman, knowing little of the area to which he went.

When he arrived in Tokyo he went to the National headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. to find out something about his future field of labor. They told him that the province of Omi was an inland division, cut off by a girdle of mountains and isolated from foreign contact, that it was conservative to an extreme degree, and in the belt of the last stronghold of the once all-powerful Buddhists.

"The common people," he was told, "you will find priest-ridden almost beyond approach; the students and teachers of your school, being educated out of the superstitious forms of Buddhism, will be either indifferently agnostic or openly opposed to all religion. You will find nothing prepared for you, but everything against you. You will have three-quarters of a million people all to yourself. Do not be discouraged if, inside of two years, you can see no results in the missionary part of your work."

Vories was almost overcome when he reached Hachiman by the acute realization of the tremendous odds against him. "I felt that I literally faced 800,000 hostile beings without even the means of communicating with them," he writes. "Fortunately I had spent my last dollar and had even borrowed money to take me there, so there was no means of escape."

Vories had a two-year contract as an English teacher, with the understanding that he would be permitted to teach Bible classes in his leisure time, so long as he refrained from mentioning religion in the class-rooms.

He first attracted the Japanese students to him by teaching them American games. Dominoes, flinch and ping-pong became so popular that when Vories asked a number of his students if they would join a Bible class they replied that if that was another kind of American game they would surely be there.

In two years, Vories had converted a class of boys to Christianity and had built, out of his own earnings as a teacher, supplemented by a few donations, a hostel which housed sixteen boys, removing them from the immoral environment of the Japanese boarding-house.

The priests of Buddhism must have watched with amazement the strides which Vories made in planting the seeds of Christianity in Omi. They exerted their powerful influence against him, and when his contract as a teacher had expired, he was informed that it would not be renewed.

With real American spirit, Vories replied that although he had not a dollar to his name, he could not be driven out of Hachiman and would stay to complete the work he had started.

His record since then has been one of unceasing activity. He first mobilized the Japanese students into an organization which is conducting social service work on a broad scale. With no income of his own to keep the mission work going he set out to find something that he could do to bring in money.

His natural talent for architecture led him to seek work of that character and he obtained several temporary jobs supervising the construction of Y. M. C. A. buildings in the different cities of Japan. Later he drew the plans himself for Y. M. C. A. buildings and the publicity which this work won for him brought other jobs, such as planning and building mission structures, colleges, schools and homes for missionaries and teachers.

FROM the architectural work grew an organization with several branches. Vories wanted to do something to help the farmers of Omi, who constitute the majority of the population. So he established an experimental farm, where the latest methods in agriculture are taught.

He wanted to reach the people on the opposite side of Lake Biwa with the Gospel. There were no railroad connections, so he built a motor cruiser and named it the "Galilee Maru." The boat now makes regular trips to carry the teachings of Christ up and down the 40-mile lake.

Vories saw many of the best of the Japanese teachers being carried away by tuberculosis. The Government was doing little or nothing to combat the plague. With the help of philanthropic friends he established a tuberculosis sanitarium, where the latest methods for fighting tuberculosis are being adopted.

Some of the missionary results which Vories and his faithful band of followers have accomplished are remarkable. He has revolutionized life in the village of Noda, which was formerly notorious for having produced more law-breakers than any other village in the province; he established the first Y. M. C. A. in the province in the village of Adzuehi, a stronghold of Buddhism; he built a rest-house by the side of a main road, where farmers while resting could read of Christian teachings; and he has started two Y. M. C. A. organizations for railroad men.

Perhaps the most remarkable thing about Vories is the way in which he has attracted the services of young Japanese, some of whom have given up good positions. There are seventeen Japanese and five Americans assisting Vories in his work. They all serve practically without pay.

They have all enlisted for a well defined four-fold purpose—first, the evangelization and reformation of the 700,000 people of Omi; second, the testing of new methods of mission endeavor with the object of contributing to the efficiency of all mission work in Japan; third, the demonstration of the possibility of rural evangelization and its importance in securing the type of convert fitted for leadership, in contrast to the former mission policy of concentrating upon mission work; and, fourth, the demonstration of the efficiency of non-sectarian united effort.

The Company

the foundation of our company—that it be a non-profit concern. However much or little be earned by our work the members of the partnership are not to be enriched. They as well as the youngest draftsmen are provided but modest allowances for actual living expenses, and all profits go to the support of a mission to an interior district unoccupied by other missions. General evangelistic work, medical work (including a Sanitarium), social work (including Y.M.C.A.'s), and industrial work are supported by this "won't work" company. So it becomes evident that the title does not refer to idleness on the part of the institution!

Here we find a company which assembles all its force each morning for prayer, before beginning the day's work. This unbusinesslike proceeding is, however, not so strange in view of the other peculiarities already mentioned.

Finally, this company caps the climax by employing a good many unfit workers. From years ago it has taken on men without previous training or experience; men who did not want to work; men who had failed in other occupations, or—worse—in character! Here is the height of won't-work-ableness. Yet, strange to say, from these wrecks and prodigals have come industrious, capable, clean, efficient workmen—outclassing technical school graduates taken in on trial! In fact, the company's drafting-room has become a sort of training school, and in it have developed not only draftsmen but even evangelistic workers for the Mission!

Why?—Because the fundamental basis has been demonstration vs. preaching. Because the leaders have ventured to experiment in Christian principles applied without limit of human "possible."

How?—First of all, by the help of God. Nothing else can account for the positive success in the face of "unworkable" practices. Second, by Christian Democracy. Partners and employees, Japanese and Americans, old and young, catch the esprit de corps and the freedom from race prejudice which make for unity and push. It has been known to happen that an officer of the company and a beginning youth engaged in friendly "rough-house" within the sacred precincts of the office building. Alas for discipline! Yes; but discipline is not needed among brothers engaged in a common task—I mean, the ancient idea of discipline in which one must be master and the rest slaves or all will loaf on the job! Third, by a compelling purpose; a common aim, toward which all strive with devotion. Each man comes to feel that his work is a trust, a Divine "call," as much as more "direct" mission work.

So it has come about that the "won't work" company works rather phenomenally well. The personnel of the workers, the objective of their efforts, their professional experience and careful service, and the confidence built up by years of achievement serve to draw increasing patronage, from all quarters of the Empire, to the impossible country town; so that the company frequently has fifty different buildings under its charge at one time. And why not?

A prominent nobleman of the Capital recently put the matter very well. He was asking the "won't work" company to undertake the planning of an important building for him, and in the course of the interview asked the usual question: "Why didn't you locate your headquarters in Tokyo?" Upon being informed of our reason, he replied, "Well, it is better to be summoned to the Capital than to push in, anyway!"

A tennis court is part of the equipment, and working hours are adjusted so as to permit of daily exercise

Somewhere Around the Corner

I'M SITTING here at my desk wondering what I'll write about. For it's a very warm day—so warm that my pen feels sticky between my fingers—and I'm just a bit tired from walking on hard pavements under the glare of the summer sun. I'm sitting here—quite alone—and it's ever so hard to think of the words that I want to write.

From somewhere, around the corner, comes the music of a hand organ—a hurdy-gurdy. It's grinding out a tune, a rather light little tune that isn't too much out of key to be suggestive of falling water, and the wind in the tree-tops, and softly floating clouds. I can't see the man who is playing the hurdy-gurdy, but my imagination paints him as a thin, stooped figure with a quick, wistful smile and a lean, dark face. I wonder if the music that he makes—music that is tuneful, though crude—is helping him to see the same pleasant visions that I am seeing? I wonder if he, too, can hear the falling water and the wind in the tree-tops? I wonder if he can pretend that the gray sky of the city is wreathed with clouds?

Perhaps the music that the hurdy-gurdy man makes is just a matter of business—a wearisome matter of business—to him. Perhaps he says, as he grinds away at his machine:

"When I've turned my hand around, four more times, this tune will stop. And then I'll press a button and begin to grind out another one. And after that there'll be another one and another. And then I'll be back at the place that I started from!"

Perhaps the hurdy-gurdy man thinks tired thoughts, like these. And perhaps he doesn't think anything at all; perhaps he just grinds away, in a detached, vacant manner. But I like to think that there is something absorbing—something interesting—about

There's Usually a Bit of Inspiration and Good Cheer to Be Found

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

every sort of work. And I hope that the hurdy-gurdy man gets his share of interest—and even fun—out of his hand organ.

FUN? But, of course. You, who have lived in cities have seen the little children come out of doorways and alleys and side-streets to frolic to the music that the hurdy-gurdy man makes. They come with bare legs dancing, and wispy skirts a-flutter—they come eagerly, as moths dart to the candle flame! Only the candle flame is very apt to hurt the moths and I don't think that music—even when it's a bit out of tune—can harm little children.

It's when the children come and group themselves around his hand organ that the hurdy-gurdy man (if he's a nice man) enjoys himself. For it's then that he's being appreciated—it's then that he's giving pleasure. Grown-ups may laugh at the music of a hurdy-gurdy—some, who have forgotten their childhood, may even sneer at it. But children don't laugh (except in the very kindest way) and they have never learned to sneer. They just have the best sort of a time, accepting whole-heartedly the gift that the hurdy-gurdy man so willingly gives.

The tune has changed now . . . and the hurdy-gurdy is still somewhere around the corner. It's an almost forgotten song that I'm hearing, a song that will make tears come to old eyes, perhaps—a song that will make young hands clasp the tighter.

An almost forgotten song—so ancient that few foreign-born hurdy-gurdy men would know the words of it. And yet almost any hurdy-gurdy man—if he had an understanding soul—could catch its spirit.

The song has stopped now. And, though I wait ever so patiently, no new song is starting. The organ man has left his place, somewhere around the corner—he and his music have gone abruptly out of my life. I hope he didn't go away because somebody told him that his music was a trifle out of tune—I hope that he didn't go away because no one smiled at him, or gave him a coin. I hope he went away because he wanted to give his songs to as many folk as possible!

I started to write without an idea—I even admitted the fact to you all! I was warm and a bit tired. And then, quite unseen, a hurdy-gurdy man began to play—and, by playing, taught me a lesson. This is the lesson that he taught me:

It doesn't matter how tired we are, or how warm, or how really empty our minds may be. It doesn't matter whether we're country people or city folk. It doesn't matter whether we're blasé—ultra-sophisticated—or whether we're all eager with life and the sheer romance of living. Nothing matters, in this lesson that the hurdy-gurdy man taught me, except just this—that there's usually a bit of inspiration and good cheer somewhere around the corner. All we've got to do is to look for it—and sometimes all we have to do is to listen to it, as I did! And sometimes—most marvelous fact of all—it will come to us, quite of its own volition, from out of an unexpected hiding-place!

"Come-Unity" Church Work in Action

How It Is Made Effective in a "Four-in-One" Congregation

By W. O. BENTHIN

(In charge of the United Church, Upper Hood River Valley, Parkdale, Ore.)

WHILE ecclesiastical councils are trying to devise means by which Church Union may be effected on a large scale, there are many places in which it already is in effect—and successfully—on a small scale. We believe our church at Parkdale, Ore., is one of those which is showing what may be accomplished by church union and community work even in difficult circumstances.

We have a "four-in-one" proposition, that is, our church is one undivided body, but is housed at four different places, miles from each other. We operate on the community plan in that we seek to serve all and minister to the people of all denominations in the settlement.

Our Sunday-school enrollment exceeds the enrollment in our day schools. A year ago we reported 164 pupils in Bible study; this year we report 310. Last year we had two Sunday-school branches; this year we have four, each in connection with preaching services. The Sunday-school missionary was invited in to help the minister work up these remote but needy districts adjoining the established work, and by team-work in visiting, organizing and preaching in six months each of these outlying districts had not only a busy Sunday school but encouraging church services. In one of the centers the people meet in a schoolhouse; in the other, at a private house.

Besides Sunday meetings these two Sunday schools have provided the people with wholesome social life. Through the long winter months when the time hung heavily each of these places had Friday evening gatherings for the entire vicinity, and the oldest timers said they had never seen such cordial gatherings. You have to live in the lonely mountain woods in winter to fully appreciate what this meant. It is no wonder that these two places were chief objects of comment at a recent county Sunday-school convention.

SEVERAL unusual features mark our Sunday-school work at the better-established schools. Transportation is a great problem for children in this land of magnificent distances, and as buses carry the pupils to the public schools, several enthusiastic men provided a bus to deliver the children to Sunday school. This was done at absolute cost, the driver donating his service and the use of the truck. Thus the handicap of distance was conquered.

Another difficulty was that many mothers had no one with whom to leave their babies while attending church services. A few of our energetic women tackled this problem and it did not take them long to obtain a vacant room in a public-school building and turn it into a nursery. Some volunteered their services as caretakers and others loaned equipment so the tired mothers may enjoy a little spiritual food while the Lord's little "lambs" are safely cared for.

The children always receive an object story-sermon at the close of their lessons, on those Sundays when their minister is present. In this way the little folks are taught the habit of going to church before they think of other things on Sunday. It may well be added that the grown folks who occupy the back seats at these little sermons seem to be quite as interested as the little fellows. Who knows but they get more out of this little service than the one that follows?

Picnics and parties are frequently given for the pupils in Sunday school in order to keep up their interest and give their teachers an opportunity to get close to their lives. These recreational gatherings also fill a vital place in inculcating a desire for sane social life that is so much needed in backwoods neighbors. At both the Sunday and the week-day activities promoted by the Sunday school, many come from non-church homes. All are welcomed and quite generally attend. This, of course, acts as a leavening influence in the homes. Thus our Sunday school is a "Come-Unity" factor.

OUR Men's Forum touches and affects the adult life of the entire vicinity. The Forum fundamentally is the Men's Bible Class in the largest Church branch. Besides functioning on Sunday, this organization on week-days takes the place in our community that the Chamber of Commerce or Y. M. C. A. takes in cities. For instance, this class decided our lonely community needed clean amusement. Mass meetings were called by the Forum, and the result was the installation of a high-class moving-picture equipment in which the people are shareholders. For over a year weekly shows have been held successfully under the direction of a committee of friends of the Church of which the minister is chairman. Quality is put first, charges kept down to costs, and the entertainments are held on a week day in a public hall. Besides entertainment much popular education is carried on by the Church's controlling the screen through its Forum.

A little over a year ago the people felt they needed better roads, but because they lived far from the county seat the County Court economized on appropriations for roads in this district. Through the Forum the public was aroused and educated to meet the need. Subscriptions of over $1,500 were obtained and offered to the County on condition that a similar amount be put into our roads. The challenge was accepted by the County's granting $2,000 to cover the money of those who helped themselves. This year this district has a special tax for good roads. The result is that we have good roads where some other places have none. Our Forum did it.

It was found that young blood needed exercise in winter and again the Forum stepped forward. This time a large warehouse was obtained and turned into a big free-for-all gymnasium. All winter long people from all classes mingled here in play and sport. The enterprise was directed by a useful Forum man.

Many of the Forum ideas are born at the Sunday discussions. The subjects taken up at the Sunday-school hour range from a Gospel Study to the discussion of such subjects as "Strikes," "Socialism," "Better Education." Men attend these discussions and take part who could not be persuaded to visit an ordinary Bible class. The discussions usually begin on some great public issue in which men are interested

A new type of circuit rider—Rev. W. O. Benthin, with the car which enables him to serve efficiently the four branches of his united church and end by considering Christian solutions to those problems. Our Forum Movement is a very conspicuous "Come-Unity" agency.

OUR young people's work is an influence that takes the youthful life in our neighborhood and brings it to a worthy level. Here again, a considerable proportion of the membership and attendance comes from non-church homes. Besides the religious training, our work lays much emphasis on the social side of young life, and evening gatherings are promoted on many a Friday night because of this. It is not an uncommon thing to see seventy-five per cent of the entire population of a given vicinity at an Endeavor Social.

Several other organizations lend themselves to practical community work. Through the State Agriculture College a number of boys' and girls' clubs were organized with church people as leaders. Two of our strong Christian women have sewing clubs and thus have contact with some thirty or more homes. The minister has a Garden and a Potato Club with 27 members, the work running through the growing season and giving him practical access to certain families which could otherwise be touched only with the greatest difficulty. Here the youngsters are mediums between pastor and people.

A worthy young woman has a troop of Girl Reserves that functions in and about the local Church. The members of this body come from homes of various types, and have made themselves useful in work such as renovating the public library and planting shrubbery on a new school campus. It needs no prophet to perceive that a Christian leader working with teen age girls has an enviable opportunity to make the Christ impress upon the women of the morrow. These girls are wisely initiated into public usefulness and Christian living.

The Boy Scout troop does for the boys what the Reserves does for the girls. It is the joy of the minister as Scoutmaster to see certain lads develop from backwoods boys to manly men. This organization, while not strictly of religious character, is a God-sent agency to influence boyhood in the better way and blend the community together in wholesome public interests. Through these various Clubs we spell "Come-Unity."

You ask what manner of church works on this community plan? We are all farmers. The church is united, formed of many denominations. We have an active and an associate membership. The active members are received in the usual evangelical way; they associate from any evangelical Church whether they are able to receive dismissals from their former churches or no.

The Church was started here as a Presbyterian mission and for the sake of having responsibilities at large it is still tied up with the Presbyterian U. S. A. General Assembly. Ours is the only regularly operating church for the entire vicinity and the people are educated to want but one. In sympathy and support this territory has little "No man's land," and it is the exception to find a resident who does not in some way contribute to the work of the church. The result of this unity is that our church is the strongest financially in the entire Presbytery, with one exception, and that church is in a town of 10,000 people, while our little buildings are in the country. A neighboring banker recently spoke of our church as "the strongest ecclesiastical organization in its business end that I have seen anywhere." People with a vision and a will to work have made this work what it is. The same practical sense and energy is used in our church work that people put into business.

BECAUSE the minister preaches at four different places it is necessary to print a calendar of services, which is mailed to every family in the neighborhood. The average month finds the preacher conducting eleven Sunday services and one of some kind on a week-day. The work is a good deal on the old circuit-riding type only the preacher uses a small automobile to wiggle his way through the woods. The result is that the little car is kept hot on the job.

As there is no other clergyman in the large vicinity the minister is spoken of as "Our Sky Pilot" or "The Bishop of Mt. Hood," the parish being located in the beautiful Upper Hood River Valley at the very base of the snow-crowned mountain.

And in mentioning the scenic setting of our work, it is worth saying that our people are doing their share to make the beauties of this region more accessible to lovers of nature all over the country. Our county only recently has voted in favor of a $300,000 issue of bonds for the purpose of constructing a trunk road through the Hood River valley. This road will connect our vicinity with the famous Columbia Highway, which it will join at the town of Hood River, and thus bring our community into closer touch with the outer world. Our new highway, known as the Loop Road, is to encircle Mt. Hood, and in coming years many motorists doubtless will find delight in making this tour. In the waging and winning of this bond campaign, the Forum of our church took an active part, helping to insure a majority for the improvement in our community, and thus an organization of the community church was one of the primary forces in a civic movement of great importance to the entire section.

The preacher here is very much of "all things to all men." The people think in big terms. Instead of squabbling about some point of orthodoxy our people dream and do practical Christian service in the community, of which the foregoing illustrations are but samples.

Readers must not assume that everything always goes harmoniously, for even here in the heart of nature folks are human. In general all goes well. However, as is always the case, a few can see neither good nor progress to have work done in away "different than it used to be" in those good old days! Happily, however, progress goes on in spite of this well-meaning, short-visioned few.

Instead of waiting for ecclesiastical councils to devise some road to Church Unity we are bringing it about in our midst. Instead of preaching "Let there be community work and Church Unity" we practice it. Who knows but from experiments such as ours will come unity at large?

The New Peace Conference

IN MANY respects the disarmament conference, called by President Harding to meet in Washington probably on Armistice Day, is more important even than the Conference of Versailles. In the last analysis it will endeavor to do what the great peace congress failed to do; find a basis for world peace that gives some signs of permanency, and it will do this not only by a limitation of armament on land and sea, but by the removal of causes for war so far as these causes can be controlled by the five dominant powers.

No act of the new administration has been met with such unanimity of approval as the President's long-considered and carefully worked out approach to the Powers. Those portions of the press that have been bitterly hostile to the Government have joined in warm commendations of what is accepted as evidence of skillful diplomacy and the wisest of statesmanship.

Going far beyond the demand in Congress, as voiced in the Borah amendment to the naval bill for a meeting of the United States, England and Japan to discuss naval disarmament, Mr. Harding has initiated what virtually is a new peace conference for the consideration of three main problems: the limitation of land and naval armament, and the future of the world that touches the Pacific.

Continental Europe and the Near East have their political and ethnic problems that provide fuel for war, but it is generally agreed that the casus belli in any future world conflict would be found in the basin of the Pacific. In that vast territory where the interests of Great Britain, Japan and the United States conceivably could be in perpetual rivalry there is a menace that can be eliminated only by some such process as Mr. Harding and Secretary Hughes have devised. For before any question of disarming can be decided, the main causes for arming must be removed. When entente is substituted for suspicion and distrust, none of the three powers concerned will feel the need of bristling battleships and frowning fortresses on the highways of the Pacific.

Mr. Harding has done a graceful and logical thing in including China in the deliberations over the questions of the Far East, and one that will immeasurably increase the affection for, and trust in us, that already is strong in the Chinese heart. Since most of the problems that must be solved revolve around the entity of China it is only fair, as the Christian Herald pointed out a few weeks ago, that she be consulted in any arrangements, treaty or otherwise, that involve her future.

France and Italy are included in the conference because they are the outstanding European militaristic and imperialistic states. France especially has strong interest in the Orient and both are seriously concerned with any proposal looking to a reduction of land armament.

In this announcement of the conference, the President has brought the United States to a new position of world leadership. Already there are assurances by the five governments approached, of acceptance of his invitation, although Japan, in her note, makes a somewhat delicate situation by accepting only for a discussion of armaments.

That great results may be expected from the meeting of the diplomatists is almost a certainty, because the very conference itself, and the alacrity with which representation is assured comes directly from pressure applied by the common people of the world. The people are through with great navies and great armies with their demoralization of civic life and their terrible burdens of taxation. They are demanding now that this Second World Congress do what the first Congress failed to do, and their voice will be heard.

Yes, We Agree!

"YES," said Old Man Ultimate Consumer, "I have just come back from my vacation. Had a good time. But I suppose one can't have a good time all the time. We have to be civilized."

"That's what I have been thinking over," said the Business Man. "Why do we have to be civilized? I never realized before how little one needs, to be really happy."

"Same here," said the Prosperous Citizen. "But do you know I spent six of the happiest weeks of my life way up in the woods by the side of a little lake. My wife was born in that part of the country and she persuaded me to go up there instead of to Palm Beach or Atlantic City or our big place in the Adirondacks. And we had the time of our lives."

"Just how?" asked the Man Around Town.

"Well, I built a three-room shack, with the help of a logger. It had a fireplace in the middle, a porch clear across looking out over the lake, and it cost two hundred and seventeen dollars all furnished. I made the tables and seats out of hemlock lumber. We did all our cooking over a two-burner oil-stove, and went in bathing every afternoon. I never wore a stiff collar except on Sunday, and we did our own washing, because we couldn't get any one else. Oh, it was great!"

"But didn't you miss the comforts of—of—well, town life?" asked the Average Citizen.

"Miss them! Let me tell you, the comforts of civilization are a bother. We were not able to take our auto up there. No roads. So we left it at home. We had no piano, no victrola, no telephone, no newspaper, no furnace, no ice-man, no gas-man, no door-bell, no servants, and no fashions. Now that I am back home again, my wife has a fourteen-room house to take care of, the servant problem to face, constant calls at the phone, or the front and back door, the racket of a noisy street to hear all day, expensive entertainment for social affairs, constant dressing up and going somewhere, and I whiz down to my business in an expensive auto, shut myself into a close room seven hours a day, wear stiff collars, eat indigestible lunches at the Chamber of Commerce, and go home dead tired at night, to sleep in an atmosphere loaded with city smoke which has drifted out to what we call our country home which cost me twenty-five thousand to build and ten thousand to keep up."

"Your vacation does not seem to have done you much good," observed the Business Man.

"Back to the Simple Life!" said the Ultimate Consumer, ironically.

"Yes, back to the comforts of civilization," sighed the Prosperous Citizen. "And in the words of Patrick Henry, 'Give me Civilization, AND give me death!'"

Secret of Moody's Power

THERE are personalities brilliant and notable in life, yet soon forgotten, and there are others whose greatness grows with the years long after they themselves have passed away. Rev. Lyman Abbott in his "Snap-Shots of My Contemporaries," now running in the Outlook, gives a chapter of personal reminiscences of Dwight L. Moody, which will doubtless have a wide reading. Moody was a vigorous figure in the religious life of his time. His mission was to proclaim the Gospel of repentance, and forgiveness and salvation through Jesus Christ. What impressions of the results of his life-work, ended twenty-two years ago, now remain, are thus summed up by Dr. Abbott:

"This was Mr. Moody's twofold message—forgiveness for the past, strength for the future. . . Mr.

Moody had none of the arts of the orator. But whenever I heard him, and I heard him frequently, he depended entirely on the spiritual power of his message and his own intense conviction of its truth. I once studied with care a published volume of his sermons to endeavor to get the secret of his power. The examination confirmed his own summary of his preaching: 'I used to think,' he says in one of his sermons, 'of God as a stern judge on the throne, from whose wrath Jesus Christ had saved me. It seems to me now, I could not have a false idea of God than that. Since I have become a father, I have made this discovery: It takes more love and sacrifice for the father to give up the son than it does for the son to die.'

"Mr. Moody did not have that broad intellectual outlook which scholarship sometimes, but not always, gives to the scholar. But he had that broad human outlook, which almost invariably characterizes the man who possesses both a living spiritual faith and catholic human sympathies, who estimates men not by the accidents of their creed, their race, or their social culture, but by their character, and can therefore recognize real spiritual worth in men of differing theological opinions. This catholicity of spirit led him to welcome the co-operation in his evangelistic labors of men whose intellectual outlook was very different from his own, and made him indifferent to theological theories which men of less catholic temper regarded of vital importance. . . . The work of an evangelist he always regarded as the greatest of all forms of service; the work of the ministry as a cramping and confining occupation."

Dr. Abbott, an admitted liberal in religion, closes his sketch with these words: "I am sure that if we of the so-called liberal faith hope to retain in these more liberal days the attractive power of the Church we can do it only by holding fast to the great spiritual fact that in God there is abundant forgiveness for all the past, and an abundant life for all the future; and we must declare this, not as a theological opinion, to be defended by philosophical arguments as a rational hypothesis, but as an assured fact, historically certified by the life and death of Jesus Christ and confirmed out of the mouth of many witnesses by the experience of Christ's followers in all churches and in every age."

Surely here is evidence that the writer has caught something of the spirit of Moody and applied it to present religious conditions.

New York's Summer

NEW YORK CITY has been sweltering in the hottest summer it has experienced for years.

The public parks, piers and beaches have been thrown open at nights, under police protection, and suffering flat-dwellers in tens of thousands have been sleeping on grass, stone and sand. The city has provided, in streets before the fire-engine stations hundreds of portable shower-baths that are turned on for an hour or two three times a day for the comfort of children and adults who may want to take advantage of the cooling spray. The goodnatured police turn a blind eye toward the park fountains when overheated tots scramble over the railings and turn the basin into a swimming-pool.

Yet out at Mont-Lawn, in the hills high above the Hudson and thirty miles from the heat of the city, 350 children from the burning pavements are constantly being made over as a result of the generosity of the great Christian Herald family. Each one of these youngsters from the poorest homes in the city, has ten days of unalloyed delight, and all it costs his unknown benefactor is a five-dollar bill. Mont-Lawn needs a lot more of these five-dollar bills to take care of the throng of little ones whose only breath of fresh air comes in this "Children's Paradise." If you want to get one of them away from the torments of a city in summer send along your bill. Some child will face New York again with a firmer grip on life if you do.

And apropos of Mont-Lawn, one of the best features of the great Christian Endeavor convention period, the delegates said, was an excursion to the Children's Home. The Christian Herald had extended an invitation to the visitors to go by motor to Mont-Lawn on the day after the convention closed. A large party accepted and spent the afternoon wandering around the grounds and joining with the kiddies in their games. Tea was served before the party returned to New York.

What the World Needs

"OLD-TIME conflicts, old-time affiliations, much that impelled Governments and more that impelled wars, was founded on revenge, while today all of us are thinking out the things we can do to bring peoples together to create a better feeling in the world.

"I have said a great many times that I do not know what there is in the revolutions of fate. There was no particular reason why I should be President. I claim no outstanding ability. I did not even want the Presidency. But somehow I have believed with all my heart that by temperament and practice maybe I fitted into this peculiar situation in the world.

"The tolerance, the patience, the good-will, the kindly feeling and desire to help form the greatest need in the world today. And if, while I am an occupant of this chair, I can add to the good feeling of our Republic and then make our Republic the exemplar of good feeling throughout the world, my services will not have been in vain."—President Harding in an address to a group of editors who presented to him a cabinet chair made from the timbers of the old schooner Revenge.

Powers Approve Harding Proposal for Disarmament Conference

FORMAL notifications of their approval of President Harding's proposal that an international conference on disarmament and on Pacific and Far Eastern problems should be held in Washington were received from the British, French and Italian governments almost as rapidly as the cables could bear the messages.

Japan sent a reply accepting the proposal for a conference to discuss limitation of armaments, but containing no acceptance of the request for a discussion of Pacific and Far Eastern questions, an important omission. The text of the Japanese reply was not made public, and officials of the State Department declined to comment on it. The Japanese government, it was explained in Tokio despatches, had expected the conference to be limited to the subject of naval disarmament, as was suggested in the Borah resolution, and had decided in advance on acceptance. When the President's proposal was found to involve a great widening of the scope of the conference, Japanese statesmen felt it necessary to consider all angles of the matter, since it is possible the conference may lay the foundation for the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese treaty, the renewal of which now is being debated.

Japan also was concerned over the inclusion of China in the Far Eastern parleys. China sent an unqualified acceptance of the invitation.

President Harding and Secretary Hughes decided that the replies made it possible to go ahead with arrangements for the conference, and were preparing to issue the formal invitations. It was suggested the conference should open on Armistice Day, November 11.

Smaller nations which were not invited to take part were so heartily in accord with President Harding's action that through their newspapers they expressed a desire for invitations and it was evident there would be no difficulty in assembling a conference, in which virtually every nation would be represented, if it was deemed advisable. Holland, in particular, desired to participate in the Far Eastern discussion because of her extensive colonies in that part of the world, for the defense of which she now is considering costly additions to her navy. The newspapers of Belgium hoped that Belgium would be invited and that agreements would be reached which would permit the nation to turn military expenditures into more beneficial channels.

In Great Britain there was no discussion as to wisdom of joining in the conference, but there was much concern as to the personnel of the delegation, which it was agreed should be the strongest Britain could send. It was believed Premier Lloyd George would like to go to Washington at the head of the delegation, but there were many objections to this and the Northcliffe papers declared neither the Premier nor Lord Curzon would be satisfactory representatives.

De Valera and Lloyd George Confer

DIRECT conferences between Premier Lloyd George and Eamon de Valera, who claims the title President of the Republic of Ireland, have been started in London with a display of good feeling and a conciliatory attitude which increased the hopes for a settlement. Their first conversation lasted almost three hours and at its end a joint communication was issued, stating that there had been a free exchange of views, in which the relative positions were defined, and that the discussions were to be continued. Both men were optimistic after their meeting and Mr. de Valera declared, "The outlook is brighter than it ever was in history."

Naturally the proposals to be offered by each side were not made public and the British press generally was anxious to avoid any comment which might embarrass the negotiations. Irish circles did not expect the Premier to grant their demand for a republic, but believed his offer of the most the government could concede would be one they could accept, and that the plan of settlement would be submitted to a vote of the Irish people.

Except in Belfast, the truce was observed, but in the Ulster capital there was a continuation of fighting in which the casualties were numerous.

Action on Bonus Bill Deferred

IN COMPLIANCE with a request by President Harding, delivered in person, the Senate has deferred action on the bill to grant a bonus to veterans of the World War and has returned the measure to the Finance Committee by a vote of 47 to 29. Several Senators strongly opposed the plan to recommit the bill but at no time was there any doubt as to the result, and the real fight was over an effort to instruct the Committee to report the bill again not later than January 1.

The President, in his address to the Senate, declared himself to be "fully persuaded that three things are essential to the very beginning of the restored order of things. These are the revision, including reduction, of our internal taxation, the refunding of our war debt, and the adjustment of our war loans. . . . It is unthinkable to expect a business revival and the resumption of the normal ways of peace while maintaining the excessive taxes of war. It is quite as unthinkable to reduce our tax burdens while committing our Treasury to an additional obligation which ranges from three to five billions of dollars." He called attention to the fact that $7,500,000,000 of definite obligations are to mature in the next two years, and warned that "the overburdening of the Treasury now means positive disaster in the years immediately before us," suggesting that bonus proposals should await the settlement of foreign loans.

Mr. Harding urged adequate appropriations for disabled veterans and cited figures to show that the Federal Government had been neither negligent nor ungrateful in its handling of such cases.

The House was devoting all of its time to the Fordney Tariff bill; and, having ended general debate on the measure, was considering amendments, with a five-minute limitation on speeches.

Greeks Begin Drive on Turkey

THE Greek offensive against the Turkish Nationalists, which the Allies sought in vain to prevent by an offer of mediation has been launched at last, and the initial successes have aroused a wave of patriotic enthusiasm in Greece, in which all factions have joined with equal zest.

The Greek forces were advancing at the rate of twenty miles a day, and the troops of Mustapha Kemal were retiring on strong positions to the northwest of Eski-Shehr, where the Greeks met such a disastrous defeat in their last offensive, and to the southwest of Kutaia, on the main line of the Bagdad Railway about eighty miles southeast of Brusa. The important town of Afium-Karahissar was again in the hands of the Greeks, and in the main they had reached the line which marked the high-water mark of their preceding drive.

The Turks were using the same tactics as before, retreating until a favorable moment for counter-attack presented itself when the Greek lines of communication were far extended, and until the Kemalists have made their big effort no estimate of the results of the campaign can be made. Europe was watching developments with anxiety, for a considerable Greek victory would change the entire alignment in the Near East.

BRITAIN SOUGHT DEBT CANCELLATION. That Great Britain sought more than a year ago to induce the United States to agree to a cancellation of the inter-Allied war debts was revealed by documents submitted to the Senate Committee on Finance by the Treasury Department. One such suggestion came from Austen Chamberlain, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the other was made by Premier Lloyd George in a personal letter to President Wilson.

AMERICAN WARSHIPS LEAVE TAMPICO. The two American warships which were sent to Tampico because of threatened labor troubles in the Mexican oil fields have left that port. President Obregon was considering modifications of the decree imposing heavier taxes on oil exports, to which foreign interests had objected.

HARRY HAWKER DIES IN AIRPLANE ACCIDENT. Harry Hawker, the famous aviator who was rescued in mid-ocean after failing in a transatlantic airplane flight in 1919, was killed when the airplane which he was testing for the aerial derby crashed to the ground near London.

FAMINE THREATENS RUSSIA. Reports from Russia have told of conditions more appalling than ever before, with millions of persons—the estimates range as high as 20,000,000—threatened with starvation as the result of crop failures due to prolonged drought. At the same time, the Soviet government was said to be conducting a huge mobilization of armed forces which alarmed her neighbors.

SPLIT ON DANIELS-SIMS DISPUTE. The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, which investigated the Daniels-Sims controversy, has filed two reports on its inquiry, the three Republican members condemning the former Secretary and upholding the Admiral, while the two Democrats commended the Daniels administration and assailed the Admiral.

CHAPTER V

By C. H. LERRIGO

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

"I'D DO anything on earth to accommodate Mr. Bassel," Harold Persmann assured us, "but as to remembering what he did with certain papers, I simply can't do it. You see I was just an office boy. All the papers in the office were mysterious and valuable to me. I couldn't tell one from another."

"This was a package of negotiable bonds," said Kent. "The total value was more than $23,000. Among them were ten bonds of one thousand dollars each, of the Albemarle Elevator Company. Does that stir any recollection in your mind?"

"Not a thing," said Harold, "not a thing."

So our kidnapping had failed. We were a downcast set.

"Thank you for coming so nicely, anyway," said Kent. "Now if you want to slip quietly back to Persmann's, I'll show you the way."

"But I don't," objected Harold. "I've been trying for days to get up nerve enough to leave Persmann. It's miserable business, dressing up and pretending to be a girl. I wouldn't do it only he took all my other clothes away to make sure. What I want to do is to go down South and get my sister. I want to take her away from the people he put her with, before they work all the life out of her. Hide me for a few days. Get me some boy's clothes, and as soon as a good chance comes I'll get clear out of this country."

"Stay right in this deserted cabin," said Kate. "It is a hard place to find."

"I have some old clothes that ought to fit you," said Kent. "They aren't very stylish but they are real boy's togs anyway."

SO WHEN Persmann reached his cottage that night he found it empty.

He came marching around to our place right off, but he spoiled his own case by not telling the truth.

"Have you seen a girl around here?" he hollered at me.

"Yes, sir," I replied.

"How long ago?" he shouted. "Where is she now?"

"Right there!" I said, pointing to Kate. "Oh, I don't mean her at all," he shouted in disgust.

"She's the only girl I've seen," I insisted.

He went all around the club grounds with his questions, and a lot of folks must have told him they had seen Kate, because at last he came back and asked: "Have you another girl around the place besides this one?"

"No, sir," I replied. "She's the only girl we have. And she's plenty."

He moved on then, and he didn't go anywhere near the deserted cottage.

I had counted so much on this Harold Persmann being able to tell us something that would clear up this mystery that clouded the good name of Major Bassel that I was terribly down in the mouth when I had to accept the conclusion that he had nothing to tell. I could hardly believe it. Why was Persmann hiding him if he had nothing to tell? It seemed to me this would be very depressing to the Major, though he did not know the boy was in our neighborhood.

As a matter of fact the Major did not know any depression; he seemed to be struggling out every day from the weight that had crushed him. I liked him immensely. There was a bond between us that I could hardly define. Perhaps it was because he had said that my condition and his were very much alike.

ONE day I asked him: "What did you mean by saying that you guessed I was shell-shocked like you, Major. I never saw or heard a big shell fired."

"No, son," he replied. "And there were many soldiers shell-shocked before ever they heard a shell explode. Being shell-shocked is largely a matter of disposition. When the doctors try to explain it they say that it's a defense reaction.

"You know there is a real man that lies back of every one of us. This Mister Personality may be a very different creature from the one we show to everyday society. But under special stress, this hidden self may take command of us with surprising results. He'll stand just about so much, but he won't go all the way through. You have to be a real man to keep him from breaking before the end of the race. This 'defense reaction' is part of the scheme. This Mister Personality is clever enough to know that if you simply can't walk, can't swallow, can't breathe, there isn't much question about your staying pretty still. So if he wants to fix it up so that you'll keep still enough to be out of further danger of shot and shell he may peremptorily order the suspension of those body industries that allow you to function. It looks and feels like the real thing. You can't walk, can't talk, can scarcely breathe. And, worst of all, you don't seem to care much to break it up. You have to summon all the manhood you have or hope for to insist on Mr. Inner Personality letting go of you. It was in that respect that the Y. M. C. A. man always helped me so much."

"But I haven't felt that kind of thing."

"No, and I hope that you never will. The Mr. Inner Personality that you have has never tried on you any of the defense reactions that put your body out of business—such as my paralysis for instance, or the blindness or deafness that some others had. If he ever makes the least attempt, call him down at once. Those bad dreams and night scares are an indication of what he could do. They show that he's one of those touchy fellows, the very kind that make trouble in the army, the kind that caused some fellows to be shell-shocked before ever they set foot on the outbound vessel at the embarkation port."

"You think mine is touchy, do you?"

"Yes, some boys could stand all that has come to you without the least notice. But you can't. So you have to be rather particular not to go up against stuff that is unwholesome or unhealthy or unclean. Otherwise your Mr. Personality might play some shell-shock tricks with you. But, of course, your doctor wouldn't speak of them as shell-shock. He would say, 'St. Vitus Dance,' or some kind of a 'tic,' or a nervous breakdown."

"Tell me how you got along when the Y. M. C. A. man left you, and you didn't have him to look at any more. You kept on getting well?"

"Yes, I kept on getting well. Because he managed to make me understand the real principle of the thing before he left me. He gave me a grand, secret recipe. Some day, if I think you are ready for it, I'll tell you just what it is."

THE Major really did seem so right and sane that I was sorely tempted to tell him all about Harold and take his advice what to do, but Harold begged us to keep his secret. We managed to rig the boy up in real clothes and he seemed a very likable fellow. He was willing to tell us all that he could about Persmann. For one thing he told us that Persmann had taken our boat. It had been his originally, but he had discarded it until we repaired it.

"I don't really owe him anything," he said. "Persmann makes a lot of the way he rescued my sister and me from being paupers, but he treats us as if we really were. The trouble with him is that he is just one of those natural born misers. He has a bag that he keeps in his bed and if he is ever to be away overnight he takes the bag with him. If he has those valuable securities in his possession they are in that bag." "Couldn't we get a look at that bag?" I suggested.

"Unless he has taken it away. I have the back-door key so we can easily get into the cottage," replied Harold.

We did go to Persmann's cottage and Harold showed us the very place in the bed where the bag usually lay, but it was gone.

"He has it with him," said Harold. "He will carry it everywhere he goes, now, even when he goes fishing."

We searched the cottage with great caution so as not to disturb anything. I found a bunch of newspaper clippings that seemed likely to interest Harold because one of them was about a sale of the farm that had been owned by his father. It seemed that the farm had been bid in by Mr. Persmann at a very little above the mortgage.

"That's old stuff to me," said Harold. "My father sank a lot of money there developing a coal shaft. But it wasn't profitable to work, I guess. Anyway it brought little more than the mortgage. I'm more interested in the item on the back of the clipping."

"What is that?"

"It's about an old friend who really did make good with a coal mine, right on the next section to ours. John Lott is his name. He was always good to us. I just think I'll go down to see him and get him to help me with my sister."

BUT Harold was not yet ready to go, and something happened the next morning that made him decide to wait at least one more day.

Persmann came to Justamere Cabin, quite unexpectedly, on his way to the Interurban.

"I need a favor from a club resident, Bassel," he said to the Major. "I wonder if I might trouble you."

"Anything that I can do," said the Major.

"Well, I go South again tomorrow. I'm rather crazy about fishing, perhaps you know. I'd like to have one more chance at the big channel cat that seem to favor the south end of the island. But I'm not a member of the club so I always have to trouble someone for a pass. Klemp, who usually accommodates me, is away."

"Certainly, I'll write you a pass," said the Major. "Do you want it now?"

"Yes, I do my fishing in the evening, you know. Night fishing is just the thing for those big fellows."

"Well, good luck to you," said the Major, handing over the pass.

I rushed up to the deserted cabin to tell Harold, and

The Divine Guardianship

A Sermon by REV. JUNIUS B. REMENSNYDER, D.D.*

TEXT—Dan. 4:17. "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will."

A FRENCH astronomer wrote: "I have swept the heavens with my telescope and found no God." This is as logical as if one said: "I have taken apart a piano, and searched the parts with my microscope, and found no music." God is a Spirit, and is undiscoverable to scientific tests, but is to be found and seen by our souls, by our spiritual vision. And if one thinks, focuses his mind upon the subject, looks within himself and upon the world about him, he will say, "There is a God. God is the surest of all realities, ten thousand proofs overwhelmingly declare Him."

But a question of first import is: "Does God intervene upon the earth? Is He interested in human affairs? Does He rule supremely here, as He does in heaven? Will He suffer wrong to prevail here, and tolerate injustice and misery, and not smite and correct it?"

There are two reasons why we might not expect God to intervene. The first is that He rules this world by law. Our minds and bodies, life in plants and animals, the ocean with its tides and salt to preserve its purity, the seasons in their rotation, the stellar orbs in their mighty sweep and revolutions, the air we breathe in its finely mixed constituents, the eye in its exquisite frame for sight, all are under the domain of law, and these laws, scientists tell us, are fixed, inviolable, ever the same. If we fall in its way, fire will burn, whether it be the hardened criminal, or the innocent, tender babe. This universal rule of law seems to leave no place for a personal God. Nature is under its wise and beneficent sway and that would seem to relieve its Maker of constant care.

THE second reason that is urged to show why God might not be expected to intervene is that He has endowed man with reason, heart and conscience. He has framed the earth to meet all his needs, and then has given him dominion over it. He has the means to protect himself from danger, to advance in knowledge, to increase his range of enjoyment, to grow like to the angels. He can avoid wrong, be just to his neighbors, and make this earth a Paradise of virtue, of love, of peace and happiness. Men and nations are the architects of their own fortunes, the authors of their own weal or woe. If, then, man suffers, it is his own fault; his evils and miseries come from breaking natural and moral laws, from rebellion against that Supreme Ruler to whom he owes all his blessings; and why then shall God be expected to come to his help? If men declare war, shall they blame the Supreme Ruler for not stopping the fight, the killing and all the horrors?

But there are answers to both these reasons. First, God is not prevented from intervening by the iron rigidity of law. He who made laws can unmake them. His laws do not cage Him as a prisoner in His universe. He is bound by no law, and can do His will, can come to man's help, can cast down or set up at any time, by what is to us a miracle, but to Him is a free act of infinite ease. Second, as to man's miseries being his own fault, this is by no means wholly true. The innocent often must suffer for the sins of the guilty. If a burglar sets fire to my house, I must suffer. The hundreds of thousands of children and babies who perish of starvation during a great war are wholly innocent. And so as to many of the burdens and wrongs and diseases and miseries borne by the race, the sufferers paying the penalty fastened upon them by others. Hence they demand sympathy, not punishment.

FURTHER, it seems altogether natural that God would be disposed to intervene. When a scientist invents a machine, designed for a certain purpose does he not take a deep, and constant interest in it? So, when God made the world, and inhabited it with men and women of such vast possibilities, is it thinkable that He would retire from the scene, and just let men go, no matter how badly they wrecked the machinery, no matter how much they thwarted His will, and no matter how they transmitted good into evil, and made His beautiful and happy creation a chaos of fiendish passions, misery and despair?

Reason and Nature teach that God must be supremely interested in the glory of His creation, and that He will not abandon and give it over to the mere caprices and mad misdoings of men. Such being the natural inference and rational argument, let us look for positive testimony.

The Bible teaches a thousand times over that God is interested in mankind, that He regards the actions of His creatures, that He means His will to be supreme on the earth, and that in epochal times He will and does intervene. It teaches in a remarkable passage in Chronicles: "For the eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the earth, to show Himself strong in the behalf of those whose heart is perfect toward Him." And in Zechariah, four great angels called "the spirits of the heavens," report to the Heavenly King: "We have walked to and fro through the earth, and behold all the earth sitteth still and is at rest." While this is figuratively set forth, could any figure more tellingly show how God keeps watch on the earth from one end to the other, as to what is going on, and as to what men are doing, that He may exercise His will and supremacy?

A GAIN His rule is declared over the nations. We read: "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will." He is not an indifferent spectator of war. He not only looks on, but casts the die of battle, as is shown by His great words, overlooked by statesmen and warriors:

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty," or "One Sweetly Solemn Thought."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—The Divine Refuge, Psalm 91, verses 1 to 11.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 538, first column).

Sermon—"THE DIVINE GUARDIANSHIP"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," or "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Reveal to us, O Holy Spirit, the things of Jesus which we here today have had spoken to our hearts, and may that revelation be to us light on the path we tread, joy to the day's work wherever we toil, and peace in the midst of the world's jarring noises. In the gracious Master's name. AMEN.

"Woe unto them that trust in chariots because they are many, and stay in horsemen because they are very strong, and look not unto the Holy One of Israel."

But most conclusively is this intervention shown in what we call Providence. The Old Testament teaches this by many beautiful figures. God is the Shepherd who leads our uncertain steps, the Rock of Refuge to which we can fly when the heart is overwhelmed by the deluge of calamity; the One under the shadow of whose wings we can find safety and peace.

Jesus Christ is our chief teacher as to this gracious Providential care. He tells us that God notes even the sparrow's fall, that the very hairs of our head are numbered, that He hears our prayers and cries, and that we should place our whole faith and trust in His fatherly watch, guidance and help. And as to how this intervention is effected—for we know that God acts through means—a glimpse of the divine method is given us through the mediation of angels. Thus it is written: "The Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." The 104th Psalm, which the eminent naturalist, Humboldt, calls a "concise and complete description of the whole cosmos, a Psalm of the world," has fitly been called a poem of Providence, in its minute detail of God's care of the needs of His creatures, as mirrored in the verse: "These wait all upon Thee; that Thou mayest give them their meat in due season."

THAT God intervenes and rules in human destinies is shown again in the events of history. It is indeed true that it is just here that we are often puzzled. As we look on the world's stage, we see gigantic wrongs, ambition and selfishness triumphant, the right trampled, and the cries of the oppressed going up in vain for long years, and we say: "Where is God? Can He look upon these pitiable scenes unmoved? If there is a God, why does He allow all this?" So the great thinker, Walker, in his "Christian Theism," says: "If one looks back on the past history of mankind, or looks out on the world of the present, and contemplates the backward condition of many peoples, the different forms of religion, many of them full of superstition and cruelty, the way in which human lives are sacrificed in needless warfare, the miserable struggle for life in many places under most trying conditions, even in our highest civilization, and then considers the silence, or even apparent absence of a living God Who cares for His children, groping in darkness, and crying out for Him, our faith in divine overrule is often sorely tried." Yet, he concludes, "we cannot but believe that a divine Reason and Love are guarding the universe." I think our mistaken judgment arises from two causes, the first, that God only intervenes at critical epochs. Were He to do so on every little occasion, there would be no scope for man's free action. We are making history; God only overrules at fateful periods. The second is, we only look at little patches, and present events; God sees history in age-long periods, and shapes it as a whole.

BEARING these two thoughts in mind, as we take the retrospect of man in past stages, how markedly must we behold the hand of the Almighty in human history. The most notable instance is that of the little Hebrew nation, planted in Palestine, just where the opposing forces of Grecian, Roman and Asiatic civilizations came in contact. What is the secret of the preservation of this race, even down to the present day, when all these mighty and ruling races have utterly disappeared? It was none other than that God had chosen and guarded them that they might give the sacred oracles of truth, and the religion of the one true Jehovah to mankind. Not only Moses, but Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Alexander and Julius Caesar, were Providential men, specially purposed to execute the Almighty's designs in the drama of human events. No historian can explain why the all-conquering hero, Hannibal, after his overwhelming victory of Cannæ, stopped without destroying the Eternal City, Rome. It was the finger of God. Christ was to come, and just at this pivotal epoch in history, there must be one universal power, the Roman, and one universal language, the Greek, in which the Gospels were written, to disseminate Christianity all over the earth.

So again in the Reformation. To effect such a world-wide revolution, there must be a leader, such as time produces but once in a thousand years, centering in himself the masterful qualities of many minds, a personality who could originate and command—a Luther. And so in all momentous periods. Baneroff relates how, when the American Revolution, the most creative of modern movements, seemed to be lost, Franklin called the Congress to spend a season in prayer to the Almighty Ruler of Nations, and from that moment the tide of battle turned to the goal of Independence. Surely no one can thoughtfully survey the tableaux of great national struggles and outcomes, and say: "This is mere accident, chance, the game of fallible men." But reverently he must cry: "Truly, this is none other than the finger of God."

THAT God does not let men run to mad and destructive extremes, but that all events are under His holy and righteous will, and that He will let the nations know that His will must at last be done on earth, as it is in heaven, is then, one of the most certain and blessed of truths.

God has a wise, vast and blessed purpose in the history of the human race. And He does not intend that His holy and righteous will shall be thwarted. For this sublime end, the stars in their courses fight, the angels are leaders, the invisible forces of right and truth are ever at work, and you and I are personal instruments. And over them all watches the All-Seeing Eye. Nature, reason, the Bible, history and our personal life experiences unite to declare that God does intervene as to the ongoing on this earth, and that neither numbers, nor gold, nor the sword, nor diplomacy, nor powerful nations, nor brilliant leaders, but that GOD REIGNS. The Church and Christians and every righteous soul should never grow faint-hearted at any dark outlook of the times, but in faith, patience, holy courage and joy, help the inward and upward course of Providence until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ, and He shall reign forever.

The Fiery Trial

SUNDAY. I Peter 4:12. "The fiery trial which cometh upon you to prove you." What is the purpose of "the fiery trial"? What is the meaning of this permitted ministry of suffering? Well, in the first place, it tests character. It discharges the purpose of an examination. An examination, rightly regarded, is a vital part of our schooling. It is a minister of revelation. It unfolds our strengths and our weaknesses. And so it is in the larger examination afforded by the discipline of life. Our crises are productive of self-disclosures. They reveal us to ourselves, and I think the revelations are usually creative of grateful surprise. In the midst of the fiery trial we are filled with amazement at the fullness and strength of our resources. When the trial is looming we shrink from it in fear. We say one to another, "I don't know how I shall bear it!" And then the crisis comes, and in the midst of the fire we are calm and strong; and when it is past, how frequently we are heard to say, "I never thought I could have gone through it!" And so "probation worketh hope"; the heavy discipline is creative of assurance; the terror becomes the nutriment of our confidence.

But the fiery trial not only tests by revealing character, it also strengthens and confirms it. Hard trial makes hard and much-enduring muscle. The water that is too soft makes flabby limbs; it is not creative of bone. And circumstances which are too soft make no bone; they are productive of character without backbone. Luxuriousness is rarely the cradle of giants. It is not unsuggestive that the soft and bountiful tropics are not the home of the strong, indomitable, and progressive peoples. The pioneering and progressive races have dwelt in sterner and harder climes.

The lap of luxury does not afford the elementary iron for the upbringing of strong and enduring life. Hardness hardens; antagonism solidifies; trials inure and confirm. How commonly it has happened that men who, in soft circumstances, have been weak and irresolute, have been hardened into fruitful decision by the ministry of antagonism and pain. "Thou art Simon"—a hearer, a man of loose hearsays and happenings; "Thou shalt be called Peter"—a rock, a man of hard, compact, and resolute convictions. But "Simon" became "Peter" through the ministry of the fiery trial. The man of "soft-clothing" is in the luxury of kings' houses; the hard man with the camels' hair and the leathern girdle is away out in the hardships of the desert. "We must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God."

But the fiery trial not only reveals and hardens the character, it also develops it by bringing out its hidden beauties. I am using the word "develop" as the photographer uses it. You know how he brings out the lines of his pictures. The picture is laid in the vessel, and the liquid is moved and moved across it; it passes over the face of the picture, and little by little the hidden graces are disclosed.

"All Thy billows are gone over me." That is the Lord's developer; it brings out the soft lines in the character. Under its ministry we pass "from strength to strength," "from grace to grace," "from glory to glory."

The Friendship of Jesus

MONDAY. John 15:15. "I have called you friends." The last discourse of Jesus contained in the 14th, 15th and 16th chapters of John is full of the atmosphere of friendship. There is friendship in that comfortable passage, "I go to prepare a place for you . . . that where I am there ye may be also." There is friendship in the promise, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you."

There is friendship in the prayer with which the discourse ends: "I will that they whom Thou hast given me be with me where I am." Indeed, the whole prayer is full of it. Nowhere else do the desire for friendship and the habit and spirit of friendship on the part of Jesus find such full expression. He not only called them His friends but He made them His friends. They so understood it.

Presently begins to appear what, when we look at it calmly, is one of the superlative and incontestable miracles of all time. The spread of the Gospel, the scattering of the seed of the Kingdom, the literal honeycombing of the world with the doctrines of Christ, was all the work of friendship. This little handful of men whom He had called His friends regarded it as an act of simple loyalty to their now invisible Friend to tell all He had done for them and meant to them. When the generation that had seen Him and heard His words, passed away, a new generation arose that believed He was still alive and that He had called them His friends.

Sixty generations have come and gone since He spoke these words, and the impression is still fresh and forceful that He lives and calls us His friends. Talk about miracles! Compared with this fact, the miracle of multiplying loaves and fishes, or turning water into wine, or giving sight to the blind, or recovering the leper, or even raising the dead, is a common trivial thing. Here is a miracle which utterly suspends and transcends all known laws of human influence. The generation which succeeded Moses did not speak of Moses as their friend. A hundred years after Julius Caesar's death, or Napoleon's, or Washington's, or Lincoln's, their admirers never dreamed of thinking of themselves as friends of these great men. The friendship of Jesus is not a mere doctrine. It is so much a part of the experience of Christians that it is not too much to say there could be no Christian biography without it.

"It Must Not Be Again"

TUESDAY. II Cor. 5:10. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." Standing before the flag-draped coffins of the soldier dead from France, which lined the steamship pier at Hoboken, N. J., on May 23, President Harding said, "It must not be again!" The sentiment finds an echoing response in the heart of every true Christian man and woman. When this phrase was given to the air and took its place as one of the great utterances, a sound must have come from heaven like the sound of a great "Amen." Certainly, a war-weary and conflict-torn humanity is heartily in accord with this Lincoln-like declaration. The very thought of war, nay the mere rumor of war, causes the cheek to pale and the heart to go weak. Of course, we must put down autocracy and defend our rights, but what a pity if we so fail to live that noble and consistent Christian life that will make it possible for all war to cease forever!

Only the teachings and example of Jesus Christ can prevent a repetition of military blood-lust, pagan thinking and selfish desire from making inroads detrimental to our civilization and causing devastation to our progress. The Golden Rule, the doctrine of the square deal, the parable of the Good Samaritan, the law of co-operation, the logic of reciprocity, the Commandment of love are not pious platitudes but practical potencies that shall work effectually to cause "the long quarrel to cease." Our message to the world is "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."

It has been said, "Christianity has failed." Christianity has not failed. When Christianity begins to be lived as an everyday attraction, rather than played with as a Sunday abstraction, and when it puts on everyday clothes and goes to work six days in the week, the Kingdom of God will come by leaps and by bounds.

"It must not be again!" War must not be again. The liquor traffic must not be again. The conflict between capital and labor must not be again. Strife, national, international, industrial, public and private, must not be again. Indifference to the highest and best must end. Selfishness and profiteering must be no more. Every thing that puts the crimson tooth and claw and fang into life must be prevented. The things that make human life unblest and existence a shambles, because they are contrary to the will of God and the very opposite to the teachings of the Christ, must not be again. So long as they remain to hurt and hinder, the Son of God is crucified afresh and the Saviour of the World experiences another Calvary.

We Live Forever

WEDNESDAY. Psal. 118:17. "I shall not die but live!" If there is one fact which has been established beyond all peradventure by the researches of modern science, it is that which is familiarly known as the conservation of energy. It is well to remember this, in view of what a distinguished scientist and inventor has been saying against the truth of Immortality.

What is the rationale of the Edison electric light? If a current of electricity pass along a wire to a point where the wire is so contracted that it will not transmit the whole current, a portion moves on and what becomes of the remainder? Is it reduced to nil? Not at all. Force cannot be annihilated. The force called electricity is simply changed into the equivalent of another force called light. Yet the inventor of the electric light, who insists so strenuously upon the conservation of energy in every other quarter, does not hesitate to deny its application in the sole province of spiritual things. He professes to believe that, while his own biceps muscle is indestructible, his soul—the mightiest bundle of energies within the entire purview of reason—can be so utterly quenched that it shall forever cease to be!

Resting for Better Work

THURSDAY. Mark 6:31. "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place and rest awhile." Relaxation and rest are as essential as work. Change of scenery, locality, climate and occupation is healthful to body, mind and spirit. Therefore we should heed the call of God's great "out-of-doors," to come and rest awhile. The glory of the Transfiguration and of the apocalyptic vision of John on Patmos appeared during hours of solitude and rest. Jesus often found Mount Olivet convenient for prayer and communion with the Father.

But it is not the seclusion of the recluse who withdraws himself from the activities of life lest he become contaminated with the world. We are to live as Jesus did, with mankind, working together for each other after periods of retirement.

Thoughts do not grow stale when refreshed by the great speakers at camp meetings, Chautauquas, summer schools and conventions, at seaside or mountain. Elijah was better fitted for the work before him, after he had obeyed the command to hide himself by the brook Cherith awhile. The quiet of the brook and the woods was for body and mind what the covert of His wings and the secret place of the Most High are for the soul. After the excitement of toil and triumph, we let the crowds go by, while we listen to the still small voice and become prepared for the next conflict.

It is good advice to go where the air is pure, the water health-giving, the food wholesome, where knowledge may be increased, mind and heart made stronger, and where you may be strengthened to continue to do good to others.

The Eternal Now

FRIDAY. Heb. 12:1. "Let us also lay aside every weight." The preceding chapter is history and the record makes a glowing page. It ends, however, in a rapid transition of thought from past to present, the eternal Now, in which we find ourselves. It matters not that centuries have come and gone; the Voice speaks to us, as we read and ponder. Our generation must hear what the Holy Spirit is saying: "The past is secure"; "There were giants in the former times."

A Westerner visiting Plymouth, Mass., recently, upon being shown the chair in which William Bradford used to sit, is reported to have asked: "Who sits there now?" In Christ's time, the Jews were wont to say: "We have Abraham to our father," but Jesus told them plainly and in all soberness, "Ye are of your father the devil." Traditions are an asset only when put to work in making history of a similar stamp.

When a good earthly life comes to an end, the last words spoken to mourning friends should always be: "Let us also." Every address in commemoration of historic achievements must come to a close with the same significant refrain. Lincoln at Gettysburg speaks: "It is for us the living—" Lowell concludes his great poem; "We must launch our Mayflower." Our heritage is an uncompleted task, wherefore "Carry On!"

Wise Memories That Fortify the Soul

SATURDAY. Psal. 111:4. "He hath made his wondrous works to be remembered: the Lord is gracious and full of compassion." What is memory? A mental reiteration of some experience. It is the repetition of all that takes place in the consciousness that makes an impression along the lines of the nerves. But whether this is the light track of a passing foot, or the rut of a grinding wheel of bewilderment and distraction, it is, in the last analysis, a matter of our own choosing. Character is crystallized choice. Undesired memories will knock at our doors. That is something we cannot help. There is no need, however, to invoke them, to invite them into the guest chamber and bid them occupy the chair of state. One memory like a nail, drives another out. We may fill our minds with the rich content and kind thoughts that will successfully combat the undesirable.

Wordsworth could people an idle hour with dancing daffodils. The whole galaxy of poetic stars occupied their minds with that which Paul characterized as things true, honest, just, pure, lovely and of a good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, they thought on those things. To drown the strife of bitter memory let us have great speech ready. Let us learn noble words. There is nothing like the sayings of Jesus, the twenty-third psalm, or the suggestiveness of some great hymn for comfort of spirit.

The thought of God, the values and inspirations of the Kingdom are medicine for the mind troubled and anxious with the burdens and incumbences of the world.

Sunday-School Lesson for August 7

Paul in Cyprus and in Antioch of Pisidia

Acts 13:1-52

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

WHEN the "Empress of Asia" sailed from Vancouver last August for the Orient, there were sixty Presbyterian missionaries, forty Methodist missionaries and twenty-seven Y. W. C. A. workers on board. Most of these were going to the foreign field for their first term of service. What a joy it was to be sailing with such a company! The captain of the ship said it was the soberest lot of passengers he had ever taken across. Though one could see by the faces of these specially enlisted Christians that they had work ahead that was worth while, it could also be seen that it was a very happy group. The days of preparation were over. They would soon be in the midst of their soul-winning, world-winning work.

Barnabas and Paul began their first missionary journey when they started from Antioch, going down the Orontes river to Selucia, whence they sailed to Salamis on the island of Cyprus. The student of missions is a great user of his geography. Follow Paul closely as he makes his three journeys and then that wonderful trip to Rome. As urged in a previous study, trace its itinerary on your map; or, better still, make your own map as you travel with Paul. Write a diary just as if you were one of that company with Paul, Barnabas and Mark. Think yourself through the trip with this apostle to the Gentiles; become acquainted with the places visited; read all Paul wrote to the various churches, the thirteen letters he prepared en route. If you are a teacher, make the lessons so realistic and worth while that some in your class will be eager to devote themselves to a life service as a missionary, whether at home or abroad. The Macedonian call for workers was never louder since Paul heeded the vision at Troas.

Back of every missionary is a praying church. It was that way with Paul and his companions. Though Antioch was vile in places, there was a company of believers in righteousness whose lives were so true that they were called Christians. They lived up to that wonderful name. In the early part of our chapter we find them working, praying and fasting. They have grasped the fact that if they possess salvation, it becomes an obligation to give the good news (evangel) to others. They must have been praying for instruction as to their next duty in the matter. Now, as then, the Holy Spirit makes His will known. They clearly understand that two—Barnabas and Paul—are to be set apart for a special mission. The church continues its prayer and fasting: devout hands are laid upon the heads of their representatives before they are sent forth.

THE direct activity of the Holy Spirit offers another opportunity for special teaching about the Trinity. Many have vague ideas of Him, the Holy Spirit, a person as definitely as is God the Father and Christ the Son. He, the Holy Spirit, has His special office work to perform, even as the other two Persons. The Shorter Catechism, question six, states: "There are three persons in the Godhead; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory." Read, with prayerful meditation, the question of Paul when at Ephesus, "Did ye receive the Holy Spirit when ye believed?" (Acts 19:2) and note the growing experience of Apollos and certain disciples with enlarged knowledge of the Trinity. Think very carefully about the meaning of the formula of the sacrament of Baptism: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen." as an adult, what did your baptism mean to you?

These two men were commissioned for service which they began to render at Salamis and continued as they went from place to place through Cyprus until they came to Paphos. It is always true that Satan seeks to turn away from the faith those who are ready to believe. An aroused devil can be considered very often as a sign of increasing victory. When Sergius Paulus was beginning to see the truth of salvation as it is found in the life and work of Jesus Christ, Elymas the sorcerer sought to throw dust into his eyes. Then it was that Paul, under the direct power of the Holy Spirit who called him for this special missionary journey, was enabled to declare the wickedness of Elymas and to work the miracle which produced blindness in the one who sought to save himself though God be dethroned. In spite of Elymas and of Satan, whose tool Elymas was, Sergius Paulus believed when he understood the teaching, and Paul had won another soul to the glory of God. Soul-winning is your chief business as a Christian.

While on the island of Cyprus, there is only one recorded work of Paul, but he must have been constantly engaged in the great business for which he was commissioned by the Holy Spirit and the Antioch Christians. This is very true to life. Very few deeds for the Master are written down in earth's books while they are all recorded in heaven.

ALL of Acts 13 is covered in our lesson study. We are not concerned merely with a few incidents in the life of Paul, but with all that is recorded about him in the Bible. Leaving Paphos, our trio—Paul, Barnabas and John Mark—came to the mainland at Perga in Pamphilia. Here Mark leaves the two leading workers and goes back to Jerusalem. Why he did this has never been fully answered. We know that when Paul was ready to start on his next journey Barnabas wanted to take his nephew Mark along. Paul objected because of this departure of Mark from the company at Perga. This caused what appears to be a friendly solution in that Paul takes Silas with him on the second journey, while Barnabas and Mark become yoke-fellows for another gospel tour in Cyprus.

Paul went from Perga, on the sea coast to Antioch of Pisidia, about 90 miles away, and the journey was dangerous on account of natural difficulties and robbers. Some think Mark withdrew because he became overtimid; others that he left the party since he joined only for a sea-coasting trip. Here we are confronted with the theory advanced by Sir William Ramsey concerning Paul's thorn in the flesh, which is mentioned in 2 Cor. 12:7-8. Prof. Ramsey suggests that the trouble was a "species of chronic malarial fever" and that Paul, experiencing a worse attack than usual, sought the high ground of Pisidian Antioch as a place for recuperation. Without question he is the greatest living authority on the life, the time and the geography of Paul. This great scientist and explorer will be in America this summer and you may have the privilege of hearing his lectures. Many think that the "thorn in the flesh" was weak eyes, due to the blinding experience at the time of Paul's conversion. With this theory in mind, read Gal. 4:13-15 and Gal. 6:11 in the revised version. Paul had to write with "large letters" because of his eye difficulty!

At least two Sabbath days were spent in Antioch of Pisidia. Read every sermon of Paul very carefully. Begin with this first recorded one—Acts 13:16-42. The usual custom of going first to the synagogue of the Jews was followed. It was a powerful message and the preacher was invited to preach again the next Sabbath. The "word of God" was then proclaimed to "almost the whole city." The Gentiles accepted what the stirred-up Jews rejected. Believers repeated the message in the surrounding country. Persecution arose and the preachers had to flee; but they had sown the good seed, and the disciples were filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit."

Double Your Income Get 8%, with safety assured

Do you know what happens when you deposit money in your savings bank? Simply this; your money is in turn invested by the bank at a higher rate of interest than the bank pays you. By investing direct in securities such as a bank holds, you not only get the safety of money in the bank, but you double your interest income, because you are pocketing the commission that your bank ordinarily earns. By investing in Miller Bonds, your money will earn a full 8% instead of 3% or 4% in the bank.

You will find Miller Bonds a thoroughly safe investment, because they are backed by first mortgage security, and are issued only on income earning, non-speculative, fireproof properties in prosperous localities. An ample Sinking Fund provides that all payments will be made regularly. There are people in your locality who are already investing in Miller Bonds. Ask us to put you in touch with them.

there I found Kent and Kate. I told the news of Persmann's early departure. "Oh, goody," cried Kate. "I think I'm very glad. This Mr. Persmann was beginning to spoil everything."

"Yes," Kent interrupted, "but this isn't a joke. If he goes away tomorrow there ends our chance of seeing if those lost securities are concealed in his bag."

"Unless we can get it tonight," said Harold.

"And why tonight? You think he may leave it at his cottage when he goes fishing?"

"There's just a chance. Not a very good one."

But I had an idea of my own.

"Can Persmann swim?" I asked Harold.

"Yes, he's a good swimmer."

"Do you think he will use the boat he stole from us?"

"Very likely. It's still in his barn."

"Well, here's my plan. We will be waiting around his cottage. If he starts out without the bag we shall have to try to get it out of the cottage."

"He won't," interrupted Harold.

"He'll take it with him in the boat."

"All right. Here comes number two plan. I know the boat pretty well. I soldered up all the holes, but I know where they are. One of 'em was pretty big. If all of them were, in just the shape we found 'em they would let in enough water to sink the boat before it got over to the island."

"What about it?"

"Well, we will play Justice. Yesterday I climbed into that barn to take a look at Invincible I. I have a strong affection for that boat. I discovered something. He stole the boat the very day I had been working on it. The solder was still green. He dragged it several feet on the ground into his barn. In doing so he opened up most of the old leaks. He is not very likely to notice them at first. Probably he will get along all right going down the creek and will only discover that his boat is filling when out on the lake. Then we will happen along in our canoe and offer to take him in. Right there will be our chance to get the bag."

"Don't see how," said Kent.

"At a certain spot about ten feet from our dock the canoe will upset. It will be your business to grab for that bag. I'll have all I can do saving myself. You will swim to our dock and hang the bag underneath it."

"I'm game to try anything for the good of the cause," said Kent. "But it doesn't sound to me as if it would work very smoothly."

I DON'T think any of them believed very much in my plan, even when they saw the way in which the rough handling had opened up the old punctures in the hide of that boat, but none of them had anything better to offer.

When evening came even Kate was bound to go over to the cottage to watch what Persmann did. Fortunately he was late getting home so it was dark by the time he had eaten his supper.

"It's so late, perhaps he won't go," said Kate.

"Don't you believe he won't," said Harold. "Fishing is the only other thing besides money that he's crazy about. I'll bet there never was such a combination in all the world before—a fisherman and a miser."

"Is he good at fishing?"

"Yes. He has taken more big fish out of the lake than anyone here, though he isn't a member. He caught one channel cat that weighed thirty-five pounds."

"Whee! No wonder he hates to give it up."

It was quite dark by the time Persmann got down to the barn and began to drag out the boat. He had a lantern that was so constructed that it could be attached to the bow of the boat and throw its rays into the water, but it did not serve to show him the defects in the bottom of the boat.

He had no particular trouble getting it into the water. Then we all ran around to our dock by land, knowing that we should not be far behind him. Kent and I stepped into our canoe and out we shot as soon as his boat came by our dock. Of course we were obliged to keep a little distance back, not to attract his attention. Every moment I expected to hear him sing out about the water coming into his boat, but he didn't give out a sound.

"What's the matter?" I asked. "Is he going to let that old boat sink without saying a word? I can't see it, but it ought to be getting lower in the water every minute."

"You've said the very thing," replied Kent. "He's so occupied with his fishing that he doesn't notice. He's used to some old, crazy, leaky thing, and he wears boots anyway, and he just doesn't notice. Look! He's got a bite, I'll bet."

Evidently he had. It was a big fellow by the way it was tugging at the line. We could see enough to see how he was trying to play the fish, but about all he could do was to let his line reel out. He had a good, stout line evidently, but it would take a clothesline to hold the monster that he had hooked. It was actually towing the boat.

Persmann was evidently excited. His line was all out. He stood up in the boat and pulled. Suddenly there was a sharp twang. The line parted. Over went Persmann into the water, and the old boat, easily unbalanced, instead of sinking steadily to the bottom as it might have done, thereby holding the satchel in comparative safety, upset and floated bottom up, upsetting also all of my carefully laid plans.

CHAPTER VI

WHEN that boat overturned in that horribly abrupt fashion and I saw its occupant pitched headlong into the water, my first impulse was to paddle furiously to the rescue. But what was the use? Persmann could swim well. Kent didn't seem alarmed about the situation. So I waited and in just a second I saw the man come to the surface.

In the same second I had another idea. I must locate the spot where that boat was overturned. It is very easy to become confused as to location on a body of water. There are two electric lights on the island. Looking backward and forward I could see that the spot was almost exactly on a line between our dock and the south electric light. And it was probably ten canoe lengths from the island.

We were not the only people on the lake. Two young men raced their canoe up and reached the overturned boat before we did. Persmann had not tried to swim to the island. His boat was a very precious thing to him and he clung to the bow with no idea of leaving it.

"I'm safe enough," I heard him say to the young men. "But please help me to turn the boat right side up. I'm awfully anxious about the contents of this boat."

"What was it, fish?"

"No, more important than fish. I had a valuable satchel in here."

"Thought you were fishing."

"So I was. I had a big fellow hooked. He was dragging the boat when the line snapped. I lost my balance and fell back. That's what turned the boat over. That and the fact that it had a lot of water in it. No, I'm not cold. Help me get the boat turned up, please."

IT ISN'T such a hard job to right a boat when a good swimmer who is in the water is helping. They had the boat turned right side up just as we got to them. Of course the satchel was gone. I don't think Persmann had any but the faintest hope that it might have gotten wedged in at the bow or under a thwart or something. We steadied one end of the boat while Persmann crawled back in.

"Can any of you dive?" he asked.

You know how much of a diver I am, but Kent is a first-class diver; and it seemed that the two young men who got there first rather fainted themselves at it.

gets that satchel from the bottom," said Persmann.

If I hadn't known he was a miser, I should have wondered at the price he put on it.

One of the young men laughed. "I'm not tempted by your dollar," said he, "but just as a matter of sport I'll step into your boat and try a dive. Our canoe is too light to dive from."

He made a very graceful dive, but came back up clanking nothing more valuable than a fistful of mud.

Then Kent tried, but he had about the same luck.

The second young man tied his canoe to the boat and started in to show them how a real diver should go at it. But he didn't get anything better.

They were warmed up to it by this time and kept on going off the stern of the boat and climbing in at the other end in 1-2-3 order, for some time. There in the faint moonlight it was a weird sight; made me think of smugglers hiding their run in a subterranean cache.

But the young men got tired soon and said they were through.

"Oh, don't quit," Persmann begged. "You'll get it in a minute. I'll give you five dollars if you bring it up in good shape."

"It doesn't tempt us," laughed the first one. "I've done more than five dollars' worth of diving already."

"I'll give you ten!" said Persmann. "I'll give you twenty!" Then seeing the young man pick up his paddle to start away, "Say, if you'll get that satchel for me, I'll give you fifty dollars!"

"Oh, if it's as valuable as that you can get a professional diver to go after it," said the young man. "I'm not a professional. I was just trying it for sport, and the sport is all through for me."

KENT and I had paddled a little distance away. He did not seem to think it worth-while to bother with Kent after the young men had disappeared. But his oars were gone. He couldn't row home, and his boat was taking in quite a little water again.

"Shall we tow you ashore?" asked Kent.

"I suppose so," he replied, ungraciously. "If I was any good at diving I could get that satchel myself. Tomorrow I'll have a diver down from the city who will pick it up as easily as if it had just been dropped on the sidewalk."

When we reached our dock Mr. Persmann stepped out. I had been expecting him to explain how that boat upon which we had spent so much labor came to be in his possession, but not a word did he say about it.

"I'll leave my boat here tonight," said he. "When it is daylight the oars can be found easily. I'll give you a quarter if you get them."

Neither Kent nor I said a word in response to this splendid offer. We were getting rather chilly, for a cool breeze had come up and our wet bathing suits were poor protection.

Harold and Kate came up as soon as Mr. Persmann disappeared.

"We shall have to tell father all about this," said Kent. "And I think it will be best to tell him about Harold, too, since he is mixed up in it so much."

"I'm willing," agreed Harold, "but I hope he isn't going to want me to go back to Mr. Persmann. One thing sure, there'll be no more girl's clothes."

Thy Will Be Done—With My Pleasures

C. E., B. Y. P. U. and E. L. Matt.

CHRISTIANITY has no quarrel with the social life. One need only to read the New Testament to learn that Jesus, Who is our guide in this sphere as in other departments of life, entered into the social life of His day. Let the reader search for those beautiful scenes wherein the Master is depicted as one who mingled freely with His fellow-beings. Examine His teachings and you will discover that the word "joy" was often on His lips. Likewise the word "blessed."

Jesus wanted everybody to be happy. Blessedness means happiness. Because a person is long of countenance and short of smiles is no sign that he is pious. Christianity is not a restraint but an inspiration. It does not push in all the stops of being but pulls out all the stops. Jesus found pleasure in helping others, doing His duty daily, living in harmony with the will of God. He expressed Himself and found great pleasure in so doing by healthful pursuits, but He never broke the sanctity of the Sabbath Day. Athletics are good but when pushed too far they hinder rather than help. Holidays usually are tonic and medicinal, but are rank poison if they interfere with the highest claims of the soul and mind and body.

Jesus found pleasure in friendship. He was a wonderful Friend Himself. We find Him at a wedding feast and at a dinner-party and presiding at a picnic. Even here He did a good turn for God. The personal pleasure derived from these pursuits was secondary to the good turns He could do the people with whom He came in contact. In an analysis of His life we find that He never substituted a dinner-party for an immediate duty. He put first things first. It is not possible to live a first-rate life by putting one's emphasis on second-rate things.

Jesus loved nature. He was an outdoor enthusiast and constantly found reminders of God in nature. But nowhere will you find an incident that led Him to neglect worship by saying, as so many do today who are supposed to be His followers, "I can worship God out in nature and do not have to go to church." Any pleasure that interferes with God's will, comes between the ideal of what we should do and the idea of what we think we would rather do, is not in harmony with God's will. Pleasure is only sinful when it robs manhood and womanhood of the idea of duty and obedience to the fundamentals that are the foundation for the only real manhood and womanhood worth considering. Vacations are necessary, but life is not all vacation. Holidays are needed for recreation, but not every day is needed for Re-creation, building up the whole person. Vacations and recreations that do not fit us for the business of living more nobly, more intelligently, more consistently, more sanely are worse than no vacations and no recreations.

Jesus went everywhere but he always went as Jesus.

Fun—real fun—is gotten out of life by way of duty not by dodging duty.

The more Christian our play-time the more Christian our work-time.

The man in jest is the key to the man in earnest.

The man at play is an index to the man at work.

Increase Your Income

Turn your idle hours into golden hours. 137 ways to make more money at home, during your spare time.

By Willard Osborne

ONE time when the minister came to break bread at the farm home of Brother Milo Jones, Milo thought the good man was probably "fed up" on chicken so he gave him some of Mrs. Jones' home-made sausage.

The sausage made such a gastronomic hit with the pastor, that Mrs. Jones gave him a liberal supply to take home to his wife.

And that's what started the Jones family on the pleasant road to fame and fortune.

The pastor's friends, the Jones's friends and everyone else who tasted that sausage said it tasted like more. And they insisted on having more; with the result that Milo and his wife were soon spending all of their spare time in the kitchen making sausage to supply the demand.

This demand soon outgrew the kitchen facilities. Then it outgrew the entire farm. Now the business occupies one of the largest and finest factories of its kind and Jones' Dairy Farm Sausage is found in the best homes, hotels and clubs in this country; bringing a higher price than any other similar product.

Most Businesses Start Small

The experience of the Joneses is not exceptional. Many big businesses were started right at home, on the proverbial shoe string.

A Fortune in Pigs

Mary Elizabeth who has achieved fame and fortune in the candy business made her first batch of sweets in the home kitchen and sold it among her friends. Charles E. Hires started his root-beer as a side-line when he was in the drug business.

W. H. Conant whose "Blaine" made him rich, started in a small way with a few boy and girl agents.

Alfred C. Gilbert started making toys as a hobby, and last year his sales amounted to two million dollars.

E. J. Shaylor, a traveling salesman, spent his spare time raising peonies. Now he is an expert in that line, has a big business and has received as high as $100.00 for a single bulb of one of this choice varieties.

One of the country's successful real estate men started during his spare time, without capital or experience and built up a million-dollar business in less than five years.

In fact the pages of business history are dotted thickly with examples of ambitious people who, starting without capital or experience, have turned their spare time to such good account that they soon built up profitable, independent businesses, and are now living on the sunny side of Easy street.

What You Can Do

You, too, can turn your spare time to profitable account. Time is money. And we all have an equal share of it. What are you doing with your share? Are you wasting several precious hours a day that you could use in starting and developing a money-making business of your own?

If you are, stop it right now! Make up your mind—today—that from now on you will use your spare time intelligently and profitably—turning your idle hours into golden hours for your spare time properly used can easily mean to you the difference between success and failure.

The best way to start is to get and follow the Independence Spare-Time Business Plans which are filled with practical money-making ideas—the real secrets of business success.

137 Easy Ways to Make Money

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any questions addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters, nor to those written with lead pencil.

THAT the Family Altar still continues to be a leading topic in many sections of the country is evident from the letters that continue to reach us. Here is one of a number received during the week:

"We, as members of a Sunday School Class representing ten families of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, desire to express our appreciation of your efforts in regard to the Family Altar in the home. We regularly observe the Family Altar, both morning and evening and consider it very essential to Christian living. Also we believe that a smaller percentage of children go wrong in homes where we find the Family Altar. We thank you for the good work you are doing.
Signed on behalf of the class,
W. G. MILLIGAN."

Olathe, Kans.

W. E. L., Willington, S. C., writes: "Yes, I have a Family Altar. In my wife's lifetime we had a hymn and read a chapter in the Bible. I would offer a prayer. Now I am living with my grandchildren. We have prayer at table twice daily, as it suits best to get all together at that time, and I read a few practical Bible verses and pray practically, to the point. I don't try to tell the Lord the news of the day. I tell Him to help us by His grace and loving kindness to enable us to live right today. And I thank Him for all blessings, and ask Him to bless our friends wherever they are, and our neighbors, and all in authority. This is my fifty-fourth year for the Family Altar in my home. It is possible in every home. No excuse will stand at the bar of God. We live in a land of Bible, and the Gospel. No learning is necessary. The one thing required is the heart, excellence of speech without the heart won't reach to heaven. And the Altar is necessary in every home because it is the only way to keep the Evil One out of the home. Jesus knocks and begs to come in. The Family Altar is the rock of Godliness."

Adolph F. B., Chicago, writes: "My parents were thorough Christians and held family prayer every day before we went to bed. This rule I have held all my life. After marriage we always said prayer aloud. This went on until our boys went to high school. Then the trouble came. The boys were out once in a while. We talked matters over and asked the boys to be home when night came. They were willing to promise but still sometimes they stayed out. About twenty-five years ago the Christian Herald asked how the fires on the Family Altars were burning. One man suggested that the best time for the whole family was at the supper table when all were home. We adopted that rule and have all the time since kept it and I will not part with it as long as I live. My children, who are now married, have the same rule. How much blessing we have received no one can tell—it is too much to tell. What a privilege to know that we can talk to God and know that He hears us and gives us what we need."

Florence G. C., Culpeper, Va., writes: "We have a Family Altar in our home. We began six years ago when we were just married. At breakfast, when the family is together, mother reads the Bible and father offers prayer. At night before we retire, we read and have prayer. On Thursday night we have song, Bible reading and prayers and sometimes testimonies. It is possible and necessary in every home to have a Family Altar."

Mrs. J. C. Shipe, Knoxville, Tenn., writes: "I am the reader who wrote asking you to give us an editorial on The Family Altar. I am trying to create a greater interest along this line in my church work. There surely can be and must be, more Altars erected in the homes. How can families be properly reared without them? We have the Altar in our home. Every morning at the breakfast table, we read a chapter and pray before partaking of the meal. I do believe every Christian home can have an Altar if they desire it. If there is a will to do this, the way will surely open."

Reader, Hollywood, Calif., writes: "The Family Altar should be in every home. First, it is a duty we owe to God; then it is a duty we owe our children. To be raised in a Christian home where the family are all gathered at least once a day around the Family Altar is a blessing that will go with us through life and help us when we have homes of our own. As I look back over my own life I cannot remember the time when my Father did not call the family morning and evening for worship with the help from the fields and kitchen. I think it possible and necessary in every home. Children go out from such a home feeling a hallowed and refining influence that goes with them into the business world or wherever they are called to go."

Don't let your children be poisoned

A constipated child is slowly being poisoned.

All the waste matter and poison slowly seeps into the system until it upsets the entire operation of the vital organs. The whole system is weakened and made a fertile field for disease germs of all kind.

Constipation is the cause of most ills, especially children. A body cleaned of waste matter resists most diseases.

WARNING

When you give a child some violent physic in the shape of a pill, oil or mineral water you are doing it more harm than good. Don't do it!

These cathartics give only temporary relief, leaving the bowels more sluggish and inert than ever.

They tend to bring on a condition of constipation even though they help a little at the time.

The intestines and bowels of children are particularly sensitive and the harsh action of a physic is apt to leave a permanent condition.

NATURE'S OWN CORRECTIVE

CALIFORNIA FIG-NUTS AGAR is Nature's own corrective for chronic constipation. It is purely and simply a FOOD—not a medicine or drug.

It is a scientifically perfect food composed of a blended combination of figs, nuts and whole wheat, dextrinized for digestibility—plus agar-agar which carries off the water and waste matter from the system.

A dish of California Fig-Nuts Agar added to your daily diet will produce results that are almost beyond belief. Any physician will tell you that whole wheat cereals, fruits and nuts are highly anti-toxic (germ destroying) and California Fig-Nuts Agar is a combination of all three of these great natural germ destroying foods, and in addition, agar-agar—the most perfect natural eliminant known to science.

WHAT IS AGAR-AGAR?

Agar-agar is a marine alga—sea gelatine—tasteless, colorless—and in no sense a drug. It is non-irritant.

While passing through the stomach and bowels it will absorb twenty times its weight and five times its bulk in water drawn from the fluids of the stomach. While passing through the entire intestinal tract in the form of semi-solid gelatinous granules, it gives great aid to sluggish muscles, lubricates the walls of the intestines, increases the peristaltic action, and carries the moisture to the lower bowel, thereby softening the stool and furnishing a very easy, thorough cleansing.

Imagine, if you can, a number of small, clean sponges going through the bowels and intestines, softly and gently—but thoroughly—cleansing the walls, carrying all waste matter before it into the colon where it is easily evacuated because of the moisture added to the fecund.

That's the way FIG-NUTS AGAR operates. Unlike purgatives, cathartics or other artificial means, they have no tendency to weaken or irritate and the result is soothing and permanent.

Invalids, convalescents, chronic dyspeptics, children and even babies can be fed Fig-Nuts Agar with equally satisfactory results.

HOW TO PREVENT DISEASE

By correcting constipation in your children you go a long way toward preventing disease.

Give them a dish of Fig-Nuts Agar every day. They will like this delicious blend of figs, nuts and whole wheat. This perfect food not only is a marvelous eliminant, but also contains blood-producing, health-giving elements which build the little bodies, making their systems doubly able to resist cold and other minor and major ills.

THEY SAY

"FIG-NUTS AGAR helps me very much, when I use it with any regularity. I seem to get a smooth, soft action without any griping. I do think it is the best thing ever for anyone who is chronically constipated."

Dr. W. H. B.

"My daughter came from the East and remained in California six months. She fed her babies on FIG-NUTS AGAR while here; they certainly did like them and thrived splendidly on them."

MID-SUMMER DRIVE FOR 100,000 NEW READERS

Present readers who help will receive rewards

Each present reader can help to make the Christian Herald a greater success and a wider medium for the spread of Christian principles.

It has been our experience that a very large percentage of new readers taking a trial subscription renew and become regular and continuous readers of the Christian Herald.

In years past we have made announcements similar to this and with great success. Many splendid features have been planned for the Christian Herald this summer and fall and a very little time given now by a host of our readers will add 100,000 new names to the Christian Herald family.

Will each reader who sees this announcement make a special effort to get at least one new subscriber to take the Christian Herald for the next

SEVEN MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR

We will reward you for doing this good work

Present readers can see how easy it will be to have their friends sign one or all of the coupons given on this page. Sign your name and address at the bottom of the coupons, returning the same to the Christian Herald direct with one dollar for each subscription represented. You will be doing a service for your friends in having them receive the good influence of the Christian Herald, arriving at their home with its splendid weekly sermon, Daily Meditations, Sunday School Lessons and News of the World, as well as a wealth of fine literature and clean, entertaining stories for 30 weeks.

Decide to get at least one new name for the Christian Herald. Note that we want all names mailed to us not later than August 31, 1921.

List of Rewards for Getting New Names

Any present reader of the Christian Herald who recommends the Christian Herald to friends and sends in one or more of the attached coupons with one dollar each and name and address of the new subscriber may select any of the following rewards postpaid.

Given for One Coupon

A New World Atlas with over fifty maps of the world, beautifully printed in colors on fine paper and showing the new changes in boundary lines caused by the Great War. Or, you may select instead a beautiful booklet of superb views, in colors, of scenes in the Holy Land, together with descriptions of the same.

Given for Two Coupons

A bound copy of Dr. Sheldon's latest story entitled "The Richest Man in Kansas." Dr. Sheldon, who is now in the Michigan woods spending a well-earned summer vacation with his family, is intensely desirous that this new book should go into the hands of every reader of the Christian Herald.

Given for Three Coupons

A clothbound copy of "Jerusalem, Its Redemption, and Its Future" told by seven eye witnesses, with 16 reproductions of photographs taken in the Holy Land. This book has already enjoyed a very large sale to readers of the Christian Herald. If you already have a copy of "Jerusalem" you may order a clothbound copy of "Dawn," by Eleanor H. Porter. This is one of her most recent and famous books.

Will every member of the Christian Herald family strive to send in at least the trial subscription of one friend not now taking the magazine? The special price enables almost anyone to take advantage of this offer. It enables all who have the interest of the Christian Herald at heart and who desire to extend the work of evangelization to make a present of a seven months' subscription at a cost of only one dollar to a friend who will be reminded of the kindness every week and who will probably become a permanent member of the great Christian Herald family as hundreds of thousands have already done.

Please act at once and be the means of having at least one new home receive the Christian Herald's weekly visits. You will be doing a great service for your friends, the Christian Herald, and yourself.

*Please return the coupons properly filled out, together with one dollar each as soon as possible.
Do not wait until August 31st to send them in.*

Purity

How many of these essentials are lacking in the soap you now use?

- 1—Whiteness
- 2—Fragrance
- 3—Abundant Lather
- 4—Easy Rinsing
- 5—Mildness
- 6—Purity
- 7—"It Floats"

Ivory Soap combines all seven.

DISHES shining in the sun—hands as soft and white as if they never had touched dishwater—these are the rewards of the woman who uses Ivory Soap for the china, silver and glass.

Ivory Soap, delightful for the toilet, is equally so for dishwashing. Everyone likes the thought of its clean sweet whiteness in connection with the dishes from which we eat. You will like its efficiency. Its abundant lather makes the washing easy; its perfect rinsing prevents the formation of the soapy film that dulls the luster of china and glass.

Ivory soapsuds are as harmless as clear water. Use them for everything, and your daily tasks will take no toll from the beauty of your hands.

GRAHAM PATTERSON, PUBLISHER

How the number of students in the theological school of four great denominations decreased in the period from 1916 to 1920

Help Wanted—Clergymen

EXACTLY who or what is to blame for the fact that five thousand Protestant pulpits are now vacant in the United States and that fewer than half that number of newly ordained ministers are available to serve these pastorless congregations?

Is the ministry losing out as a life-work for young men? Are young men less concerned nowadays in heeding the call for whole-hearted Christian service than in previous years, or is it merely the character of their work for mankind that is changing?

These questions crop up quite naturally when one has in hand the enrolment returns in Protestant seminaries for a period of years. Indeed, the figures of declines seem in themselves to demand that thinking Americans face the facts frankly to discover where the real difficulty lies. And so let us tackle the problem honestly and with an interest seasoned with an optimism regarding the quality of the nation's manhood which hesitates to censure rashly.

Because the survey was made in June the contrast between the thriving secular colleges and universities, crowded as never before, and the waning condition of the theological seminaries was the more striking. It was soon apparent, moreover, that not only had the graduation figures fallen below their pre-war level—a condition from which all professional schools are only now recovering—but that the undergraduate registration has also diminished seriously.

In the Episcopalian institutions, particularly, the decline was noticeable, with a decrease in students from 463 in 1916 to 193 in 1920. The Presbyterian and Congregational seminaries ran a close second, with the Presbyterians showing an enrolment of 1,188 in 1916 as compared to 695 in 1920; and the Congregationalists falling from 499 to 255 in the same period. In Methodist seminaries the decrease was from 1,226 to 976 in the four years. Roman Catholic institutions, on the other hand, show a steadily mounting enrolment which was unimpaired even under the strain of the war demands.

ACCORDING to the figures furnished by the States Bureau of Education through 1918, which give the total enrolment for all seminaries—Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish in toto—the attendance upon theological seminaries increased very gradually from 1870 to 1915, beginning with 3,354 and mounting to 10,558. Just before the United States entered the war the enrolment accelerated its previous pace, reaching 12,051 in 1916; but this was followed by an immediate slump to 9,354 when the nation entered the conflict. No further figures have been furnished by the Bureau, but later returns from the institutions listed in the Bureau's reports show that Protestant churches have failed to recover their pre-war status and the results for 1921—although not yet complete—indicate a slight decrease over last year.

Dr. Robert L. Kelley, secretary of the Council of Church Boards of Education in the United States, who keeps his finger on the pulse of the situation constantly, estimates that there are in all no more than 1,600 seminary graduates this year, as compared with 1,800 last June, when the number was subnormal. And not all of this number will be available for the ministry, he points out, since some are going to foreign fields and others will continue studying. It is he who matches the total with 5,000 empty pulpits in all parts of the country awaiting earnest, capable young leaders. In addition to the seminarians he estimates that there will be about the same number of Bible student graduates, men and women who in most cases have received a short training in addition to the high-school course, and are therefore less well prepared to meet the more complicated problems of the modern church than the theological students with their college training.

Decrease in the Number of Students Preparing for the Ministry Presents an Alarming Problem for the Church

"Few people actually appreciate the seriousness of the situation," said Dr. Kelley. "Fully five thousand pulpits are now vacant throughout the United States and another five thousand will need ministers next year. Even were every graduate minister available this year the total, 3,200, would only half fill the need. There are scarcely 5,500 students in all the Protestant seminaries; this should represent the mere graduation total, while four times that number should now be enrolled if the supply would equal the demand."

IN THE February, 1921, issue of Church's Ministry, an Episcopalian publication, the decrease in enrolment in Protestant seminaries is estimated at 4.75 per cent. The percentages are distributed as follows:

| Seminaries              | Per cent.     |
|-------------------------|---------------|
| Baptist                 | Decrease 3.44 |
| Presbyterian            | 20.95         |
| Protestant Episcopalian | 32.33         |
| Congregational          | 37.63         |
| Methodist               | Increase 4.39 |
| Lutheran                | .83           |

At this time the decreases in the Baptist and Congregational seminaries are less serious, however, although they are far below normal, and the Presbyterian and Episcopalian institutions still make a poor showing.

SOME group of people—parents primarily—must interest themselves actively in filling the theological schools if the churches of the land are to be ministered to. There has been much discussion in the last year or two of the decreasing enrollment of students for the ministry, and many reasons advanced to explain it. Miss Armstrong in this article has obtained the opinions of a group of men who are directly interested, and at the same time presents the first comprehensive survey of the situation that has come to our attention.

Notable exceptions to the general rule, however, are to be found in such large institutions as Union Theological Seminary, New York, the University of Chicago Divinity School and the Yale Divinity School, where the attendance is larger than usual. Union, for example, has just completed its record year with 317 students as compared with 164 in 1910 and 273 in 1916, despite the fact that its tuition fees are higher than ever before and its requirements are exceptionally rigid. All statistics of denominational students tend to be somewhat flexible, however, since many students are attending seminaries of other denominations and some of the churches have no accurate record of the number of students attending other institutions.

Added to the report of the Episcopalian committee the Inter-church World Movement Survey of theological students of North America of 1919, reporting upon 63 institutions, showed the attendance to have been but 71 per cent. of what it was before the war, or an average drop of from 61 to 45 students. While this was to have been expected at that time the almost static condition which has been the rule since then is causing considerable anxiety among Protestant churches.

THE Episcopalian Church is also disturbed over the fact that the number of its postulants—those who indicate their intentions of entering the ministry while in school or college—has decreased. In 1916 there were 693 postulants as compared with 393 in 1920; in 1916 there were 256 students and only 179 in 1920, while the total number of candidates was reduced from 466 to 306 in that time. The church admits through its organ, Church's Ministry, that it now draws more than fifty per cent. of its recruits from non-church families and that the total number of ordinations was reduced before the war from 2,655 in 1901 to 2,463 in 1916 despite the increases in population.

At the seventh annual education congress at Park-Hill-on-Hudson last January, Rev. O. D. Foster, university secretary of the Council of Church Boards of Education said: "The seriousness of the situation cannot be easily exaggerated. If the Church is to hold her place in the future, to say nothing of taking advance ground, she must in some way lead more strong men into the better class of seminaries. These schools are equipped to take care of many more men and they are making noble efforts to get the men to fill up their classes, but they cannot do it single-handed. They need the co-operation of the pastors, college professors, Christian parents and all."

"One of the most 'successful' pastors in one of the greatest churches recently stated that during his pastorate of ten years in that place not a single boy of his congregation had entered the ministry. Since this is not an unusual case, the task of the seminary in recruiting for itself is a great one. Until the pastors and parents can be interested more in the ministry as a calling the seminaries will continue to face the same difficulty. The situation is so serious that every agency of the Church, whose business and interest it is to recruit the right sort of man for the ministry, should have every possible influence for helpfulness put at their disposal without delay."

HALF a dozen important reasons are promptly offered for the decline in the number of theological students, but the suggestion that it is due to religious doubt, fostered by the war and the disillusionment of the world disorder which followed it, is most often offered. The economic disadvantages of the ministerial service, made more real because of the high cost contingent with the war, are often referred to; and there are many who insist that the young men are more eager than ever to serve in the world regeneration process, but are convinced that they can do it through other avenues than the ministry.

The June faculty letter of the Harvard Divinity School, which deplores the falling attendance there as well as at the Andover Theological Seminary (Congregational) and the Episcopal Theological Seminary and at many other schools throughout the country, says:

"The phenomenon is a very disturbing one to all who are interested in the welfare of the Protestant churches of our country, which are certain in the next decade to be seriously affected by the shortage of ministers. The problem is a very complex one, which calls for careful and detailed analysis. The decline in the economic status of the minister and the corresponding decline in his social influence are most important contributory causes, as are the changes of religious emphasis during the last half century, the decline in the religious life in the home and the greatly increased attractions of many other professional opportunities which offer invitations to young men of the type who formerly went into the ministry.

"It is essential that ministers today who are concerned for the future of their profession should set the facts squarely before their parishioners and should point out to them that unless fathers and mothers think it worth while to encourage their ablest sons to enter the ministry the Christian Church is certain to suffer a grave decline in influence through the lack of devout and well-trained ministers."

BEGINNING the "careful and detailed analysis" suggested by the Harvard Divinity School, we find Rev. Dr. E. W. Fosbroke, dean of the General Theological Seminary in New York City, attributing the falling attendance to the effects of the war. A tendency to more progressive thinking on the part of certain churches he considers another cause.

"It seems that those churches which have tried most deliberately to meet the demands of progressive thinkers for a modern interpretation of religion have been the hardest hit by the war," he said. "The Episcopal, Congregational and Presbyterian churches have felt the strain most, chiefly because their young men have been thinking independently since the war and struggling to choose the right course. These churches appeal to a thoughtful constituency, which refuses to accept doctrine without question.

"Naturally so tremendous an event as the great conflict has given rise to much questioning. Many of the men have returned frankly baffled. They admit that they are not sure that the Church offers the solution for all human problems. It takes a certain amount of assurance to enter the ministry. One must be confident that it shows the way, and we do not want men who do not take the intellectual side of the profession into first consideration. Mere willingness to espouse the cause because it is a great thing to do—the motive that actuates social workers—is not enough for us today. This field demands great thoughtfulness and sets a high standard for admission."

Much of the optimism generated overseas regarding the increase in recruits for the ministry after the World War has been scattered to the winds by this time. When battles raged at white heat religious fervor was at its height. "Y" secretaries wrote home encouragingly of the devotion which the men were showing and their confidence in the increased enrollment in the ministry. But when the great danger was passed many of the men became less consecrated, and by the time they reached the United States the number of recruits had dwindled pitifully. The churches fought bravely to keep their machinery running smoothly, but against fearful odds. Not only were there fewer men entering seminaries but some of the ministers wanted to leave their fields for a "broader" work.

AS FOR the type of men now in the work the opinions, on the whole, are most encouraging. Dr. Ezra H. Tipple, president of the Drew Theological Seminary, of Madison, N. J., believes that the war not only stimulated enrollment in Methodist institutions but improved the character of the men. "The war has had a good effect on all our seminaries," he said, "arousing in the men a desire to serve."

Dr. Samuel McCrea Cavert, general secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, though a member of the organization's committee on the war and religious outlook, frankly states that the war has had little effect on the present situation. "I was not surprised that there was no great spiritual impetus after the war," he said. "How could there have been after so much strife and sordidness? But it must be remembered that many of the men who would formerly have entered the ministry now have broader fields from which to choose. The 'Y' secretaryships, social welfare work and a number of semi-religious opportunities for service draw the men away from the ministry. But that work is also of great value to the community."

Dr. Kelley, who was likewise certain that having handled pitch it was to be expected that the men would have become black to some degree and have seem far better than those of my generation, while the mediocre men are far worse than those of thirty years ago. The only way in which the seminaries can eventually recover is by raising admission standards. The shortage of recent years is undoubtedly due to the laxity in entrance requirements for some time previous.

"For a long time the seminaries have been open to practically anyone who applied, because there has always been a real need for ministers. But as an inevitable result the institutions maintaining such low standards have made but slight appeal to the type of men most desired in the profession and only those so imbued with the importance of the work as to overlook this condition entered. The salvation of the churches actually depends upon stiffening the standards in the seminaries."

THE Very Rev. E. W. Fosbroke, dean of the General Theological Seminary, is also desirous of seeing standards elevated and equally sure of the improved quality of the men now coming to that institution. He considers that the greatest deterrent in the way of entering the ministry is the feeling on the part of young men that the clergy is a class out of the main stream of life, admission to which would somehow keep them beyond the things of everyday interest. "If the laity want a larger ministry—which means that they want the Christian religion—they must make possible a franker understanding between themselves and the clergy," he said.

Dr. Percy Stickney Grant, pastor of the Church of the Ascension, New York City, is confident that there are thousands of red-blooded young men eager to serve mankind in all kinds of Christian service and many who would enter the ministry if they could go on applying the modern training they have received in college. "Make the seminaries the 'continuation-school' of the colleges and universities, teach modern philosophy and permit liberal thinking and the seminaries will be filled to overflowing," he prophesied. "The men are all right but the methods are, in many cases, antiquated. At Union Theological Seminary, for example, where the students are taught liberally, there is no difficulty in finding students."

It takes but little research to discover that the majority of the more liberal institutions and those having a university connection are flourishing while the smaller seminaries in little towns are becoming deserted. The enrollment at Union this year is 317 as compared with 251 in 1914, 164 in 1910, and 128 in 1901 despite the fact, as Dean Charles Ripley Gillett of that institution pointed out, "that the seminary was debarred from the Presbyterian General Assembly for being too liberal and the tuition fee of $150 is the largest anywhere. In addition the entrance requirements are exceptionally high, students having to qualify for entrance to the graduate school of Columbia University to be admitted. And this year twenty-two sets were represented at Union by 122 students."

IN TALKING with a score of other leaders of Protestant churches one of the reasons most frequently mentioned in connection with the low enrollment in the seminaries was the greater interest young men are showing in Y. M. C. A. work and other forms of social service. But upon investigation at the International "Y" headquarters it developed that the ministers are laboring under a misconception in this matter. David R. Porter, executive secretary of the Student Department, International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., for example, said that in general the Association was not getting many men who would have been ministers, and proved it by showing that in the past ten years the number of college men entering the work had remained practically static. "Every now and then we get an outstanding man and people begin to think that everybody is coming to us," Mr. Porter explained, with a smile. "I wish they were."
